The Heart Divided A COMPLETE NOVEL By Nelia Gardner White

SALE

BETTY HANNAH HOFFMAN says, "Graduating from Smith College in '39, I came to the JOURNAL and, like Janie in Meet Three Career Girls, got a job as a secretary. Became a staff writer, had a wonderful time buzzing around the country on How America Lives stories, but right now I'm wildly interested in babies: at home awaiting the birth of my first. Married to a lawyer and live in Villanova, Pennsylvania, in a reconverted barn. The homemaking instinct in me is solid although sporadic, and if I'm not melting the feet off a silver platter (by putting it into the oven to warm), I'm forgetting to salt the potatoes or chill the lettuce. Cats and reactionaries make me nervous, and so do horses—only more so."

The greatest star of the screen!

It was successively a best-seller . . . a Reader's Digest classic . . . a Book of the Month.

★ ★ ★ ★

★ ★ ★ ★

It's W. L. White's "They Were Expendable"—carved out of some of the most dramatic events of all time.

This is M-G-M's heart-stinging story of some of the most heroic headlines of recent years.

★ ★ ★ ★

And it's the story of "Brick", who loved a boat. And of "Rusty", who loved a girl.

★ ★ ★ ★

Robert Montgomery (back on the screen after his war-years with Uncle Sam's Navy) is magnificent as "Brick", who'd rather command a PT-boat than a battleship. The part's a natural for the star who was skipper on a PT-boat when they were shooting for keeps.

★ ★ ★ ★

John Wayne is "Rusty", who scoffs at the "sea-going mousetraps" and wants to transfer to something that can deliver a man-sized punch. But that was before the fighting started!

★ ★ ★ ★

There's a tremendous thrill in watching those suicidal "sea-scooters" in action! The thrill of battle, of terrible peril. And a surge of pride that will quicken the beat of your heart.

There's a thrill, too, of a gentler kind, in the wistful, wishful romance between the hard-bitten PT-boat Commander and the Army nurse. Lovely Donna Reed makes a perfect "Sandy", the tireless dungareed angel of mercy who tends their wounds and steals their hearts.

★ ★ ★ ★

There's a gripping sense of realism in "They Were Expendable"—evidence of the directorial deftness of Captain John Ford, U.S.N.R., the expert screen play of Comdr. Frank Wead, U.S.N. (Ret.). Cliff Reid is associate producer.

★ ★ ★ ★

Jack Holt, Ward Bond and a consummate cast back up the stars with stellar performances.

The screen can offer no greater thrill than this story of gallant men and women who never expected to return. "They Were Expendable."

Tests Prove Oxydol Washes Clothes CLEANER and WHITER!

Yes, Whiter! In wash test after wash test—Oxydol proves that it washes clothes cleaner and whiter than many other soaps that fail to get out that last possible trace of stubborn dirt and grime!

White and Bright Wash After Wash! Soaps often leave behind tiny discoloring particles caused by dirt in the clothes and the "hardness" of the water. Even with careful rinsing some of these impurities stick in the clothes and turn gray or yellow under ironing heat. But Oxydol combats "dirty grayness"—actually helps prevent grayness particles from forming!

New "Hustle-Bubble" Suds Lift Dirt Out! Oxydol's new "Hustle-Bubble" suds are so active they lift dirt out. And they work longer, too—long after suds from many other soaps die down! "Hello, there!" Dorothy Black arriving at LaGuardia Field from England.

NEW YORK—IT'S WONDERFUL!

By Dorothy Black

New York, U. S. A.

My dear Bruce and Beatrice: I know just what a mouse must feel like which has been cooped in a trap for six years on a low diet. I love my dear country. I shall shortly return to do all I can for her. But never have I been gladder to see the white cliffs of Dover disappear in that gale that is always blowing when I set out to sea. Of the incredible discomfort of contemporary travel, we will say nothing. It was worth it. When the plane touched down at LaGuardia and gave me back my own tummy, life began anew.

For the first few days I felt as if I had been hit on the head with a fancy hammer that produced stars too vivid, colorful and numerous to be described. There is so much of everything. The shops are Ali Baba's caves of luxury. The piles of oranges and lemons and bananas stun one who for five years hasn't seen one. I intend buying a lemon just to carry around. The clothes are wonderful. In England my coupon ration allows me one pair of stockings per month between now and April. Nothing else. Should one go in for that stout wool underwear so needed in our unheated houses she can't have any stockings. It is quite a problem to decide just where to be cold. The multitude of dishes, and the richness of them, here makes life a long battle not to overeat. Ours is a fatless diet just now, in which the potato and the pig's foot play a large part.

But I think what gets me most of all is the nonsense. We are really quite adequately fed, even though we may groan a bit when it is tripe and onions again. And we are more or less covered in all areas that really matter, even though our stockings often look like discards from a baby elephant's front legs. But of nonsense there is none. Not a handsome toy, no bijoux fixé, no lovely towels with pink roses, none of those wonderful pearls which, were they all they appear, would mean a girl need never work any more. And the shopwindow I found it hardest to pass by was the one in which a Teddy bear, colored rose pink, with endearing blue soles to his feet, lay cozily on a small blue bed with a dimity cover!

Meeting a darling boy I have known since he was six, now at twenty-two a war veteran badly smashed up and on a pension, was the other side of the picture. But at least they don't have the problem of how on earth to feed him and build him up again. That's one of the hard things to bear in Europe today. The boys who come home need more than most families can give them.

Yes, America certainly seems to have everything. Except hats and hope. Oh, the hats! Even in England in wartime we never rivaled the ghastly confections poised in shopwindows, the feathery masses nestling in bandboxes like fowls gone broody there. The fearful and awful felt erections, like Kubla Khan's stately pleasure dome with caves of ice, one sees borne along on the heads of some of the best-looking girls in the world. Something looks as if it had gone wrong in the hat department. Too many milliners seem to be arranging what look to me like little tea trays spread with a textile meal.

And I am struck by the strange despondency, the lack of trust in the future, and the gloomy outlook of people who, it seems to me, are having a whale of a time. Too many folks over here seem to think more war is imminent, the world's engine knocking, if not seizing up, and the atom bomb like an unattractive bogey lurking in some unspecified place just around the corner. About to End It All! And soft music plays, and the crème de menthe is frappé.

In a similar party in London, after a dinner that has been one of those gastronomic feats a girl prefers to forget, we would all sit sipping our Aberdeen cocktail (glass of water with a cherry in it) looking out maybe onto a bomb site. (That is one of the things that still seem so odd over here. Nothing has been blown down, or shattered, or wiped out.) But everyone would be full of plans and high hopes. Admittedly the immediate future doesn't look all that rosy, but we don't just think maybe we'll get by. We know we will. Over the horizon there is coming a glorious tomorrow in which the atom bomb figures merely as a rather handy invention which is shortly going to provide everyone with a washing-up machine.

There is a wonderful moral here, I am sure, but I don't know what it is. So I will end, with best love from one Englishwoman who is having a wonderful time.

LAST TRUMP

TWO thousand years ago an event fully as epoch-making as the birth of the atomic bomb occurred, when Christ was born and pronounced the principles of what was to become Christianity.

What Jesus had to pronounce was that the world could be saved only by love.

Today the world has once again been shaken to its foundations—this time by the birth of the atomic bomb.

What the atomic bomb means to humanity is that the world can be saved only by love.

Because human beings fear love—so recently have we emerged from the jungle—only a handful of the great religious geniuses have understood Jesus and followed him. A handful of religious geniuses and those many loving women who through care and sacrifice have nurtured humanity from the cradle to the grave.

But many, fearing love, have, down through the centuries, put off until tomorrow what should have been today's imperative. In fear, we have lived and fought who might, in love, have created God's world.

Now the atomic bomb, born in hate, has been released on a world appalled at the destruction which awaits us all unless we learn to love one another enough to trust one another.

Suddenly we find ourselves our brothers' keeper. Suddenly our great fear is not to love.

Will humanity, which would not choose love, be forced by the basic primal law of self-preservation to accept love as its only choice save destruction?

Out of the crucifixion of those who died at Nagasaki and Hiroshima (as well as of our own men who died in Europe and the Pacific) may come the final redemption of the world.

If not, we cannot, like Jesus, cry, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?"

But only, in the agony of the world's death, after two thousand years of patience, "Why, in Christ's name, have we, by our final choice, forsaken God?"

BRUCE GOULD.

TOWARD THE "BIG ONE"

By Dorothy Thompson

THERE seems to be practical unanimity among scientists and persons of a philosophical bent of mind, that with the discovery of the atomic bomb we shall either have "one world" or "no world."

Actually that was obvious to the thoughtful even before the atomic bomb was discovered. This war was not "just another war," but was, in itself, a revolution more profound than any political revolution that has ever occurred in history.

The beginnings of that revolution—the first whisperings—were to be seen and heard over a century ago with the introduction by revolutionary France of conscription; the beginning of the concept of "total" war. Before that, for centuries, wars had been waged by "mercenaries"—professional soldiers—and were always for limited objectives: the changing of this or that frontier, the adding of this or that province to the domain of this or that monarch. Being thus waged between hired soldiers who had no other profession or interest, and often between monarchs who were kinsmen, or who, in any case, wished to preserve the monarchic principle, they were relatively humane, attended by many codes, and excluded entirely the notion of the "war of survival." Every European state has survived repeated wars of this kind, some ending in total defeat, such as that twice suffered by France—in the Napoleonic wars and the Franco-Prussian War of 1870–71.

The Congress of Vienna, which settled the fate of Europe after Napoleon's defeat, was participated in by France, in the person of Talleyrand, and the peace treaties left France intact. The peace treaty made by Bismarck's Germany after the defeat of France again, in 1871, took away, to be sure, the partly German-speaking provinces of Alsace and Lorraine (against the opposition of Bismarck) but assessed reparations which were paid in five years without even a fluctuation of the French currency, and left France an army. No particular credit attaches to Bismarck's "generosity." The concept of the destruction of a state—its disappearance, as a power, from history—was simply not part of eighteenth or nineteenth century thinking.

The emergence of democracy, the growth of science, and the radical revolution in weapons of war—the discovery of aviation, the possibilities of destruction by robots and by planes and weapons from far-distant bases, V-rockets, and the rest; the primary war role assigned to industry, bringing both the industries and the masses of industrial workers directly into the war picture and making industries primary targets—all these things with which we are now so woefully familiar, but which are radical innovations, pitted whole peoples against whole peoples, engaged for the first time in history every civilian, and turned every industry and communication system into a battlefield.

The concept of "breaking enemy morale" is an old one. In ancient China, I have read, hostile armies faced each other in terrifyingly hideous masks, from behind which they emitted blood-curdling yells, the decision being won by those who first "scared the others to death." But "breaking enemy morale" had hitherto been confined to the morale of armies, or, at most, of governments. For the first time, in this war, on a huge scale, demoralization extended to all the people of the enemy, through the tactic of "saturation" bombing. No immediate military objective lies behind it. It is of barbarous wantonness, destroying homes along with factories, the most glorious works of art along with ball-bearing plants, and little children along with productive workers. Its object is to create panic, civilian disorganization, refugees cluttering roads, and break the will to fight even through a father's concern for his baby, or a son's for his mother. It is the logical accompaniment, however, to the "total," "people's" war, and the "progress" in weapons of war.

Finally "total victory" presumes the permanent destruction of the war-making powers of the enemy. Since a primary war-potential is basic industry, not only must the arms of the victor—it is argued—be broken, but all the factories capable of ever again producing such arms must be dismantled, destroyed, or controlled forever. The vanquished does not pay "reparations" in money; he is forever deprived of steel plants, chemical plants, physical laboratories, shipyards, civil aviation—all means by which men not only make war but earn their livings. The enemy is thus (Continued on Page 102)

"...Still going strong without a single thing done for it!"

"I want to say a million thanks for our G-E Refrigerator. It was the first piece of furniture we bought for our home in 1931. Today, it is still going strong without ever having a single thing done for it except defrosting."

—from an unsolicited letter by Mrs. Calvin M. Weese, Elmhurst, Illinois.

The 1931 G-E Refrigerator owned by Mrs. Weese. Inside the famous old "G-E Monitor Top" is the "sealed-in-steel" refrigerating unit that has operated for 14 years. The modern G-E Sealed Unit — more compact, more efficient—is hidden within the cabinet base.

Your new G-E Refrigerator will be far lovelier — and packed with features undreamed-of in 1931. But, most important, it will be built around the hermetically sealed G-E Unit"— for years of attention-free service! The refrigerator above is the 7-cubic-foot De Luxe model, now available.

Only $188.25, including Federal Excise Tax, a 5-year Protection Plan and delivery to your home.

For better living — this G-E Home Freezer, to keep delicacies summer-fresh all year 'round! Because it holds so much food, dependability counts for even more than in a refrigerator. That's why G-E Home Freezers, too, are built around the famous sealed-in-steel Refrigerating Unit!

A MILLION IN SERVICE TEN YEARS OR LONGER

The soundest way to choose your coming refrigerator

It's only natural to pay most attention to things you can see and admire!

That's why we believe you'll fall in love with G-E Refrigerators' time-saving, work-saving convenience and features.

But we hope you'll also remember your real reason for buying a refrigerator . . . safe, efficient preservation of food.

A refrigerator must preserve food every day and night . . . every week—year after year after year!

Its cooling mechanism is the best reason of all for choosing a General Electric Refrigerator! For 19 years ago, G-E engineers developed a radically new type of unit—so free from trouble or wear that it could be permanently sealed up in an airtight steel case!

Not a drop of oil could leak out. Not a speck of dust could seep in. It was safe from moisture, air, and corrosion—built to last and last and l-a-s-t!

It was this unit that made the G-E Refrigerator famous. Mrs. Weese's 14-year-old G-E, untouched by any repairman, is only one of a million G-E Refrigerators in service ten years or longer.

Today's "sealed-in-steel" G-E unit, greatly improved, is smaller—concealed. It has far more freezing capacity; uses far less current. And it is more reliable than ever! General Electric Company, Bridgeport, Connecticut.

HELP WIN THE PEACE—BUY AND HOLD VICTORY BONDS

GET THE GALS TOGETHER!

IN every week there are seven nights. Sometimes they're long, sometimes they're short, but if you have to set aside five for hitting the books—why, a gal has a right to have fun once in a while! So if your Friday and Saturday evenings are crowded with invitations for basketball games, juke-box dances and solo movie dates with all the smoothest characters in school, that's wonderful! If your top bureau drawer is cluttered with dance programs, ticket stubs, pressed gardenias and a couple of exchanged class pins, you're wonderful! But you aren't satisfied just to have your fun, tuck it away in your diary and then forget about it, are you? Any high-school gal likes to talk about the fun she's having!

Or maybe you aren't having all the good times you should have. Every day in the week is just another blue Monday to you with no loves in your life, no phone that jingle, jangles with big plans for the week end and no prospects of a Van Johnson, j.g., cropping up in your life before prom time. Empty evenings loom up like black clouds hanging over your social schedule. You may have a whole headful of ideas that are fun and interesting to do, but you just can't get the gang together to do them. You feel that you could be a smooth and smart gal, but you just don't know how to get started! The answer is easy. Round up your gal pals, the girls with whom you have the most fun—and start a Sub-Deb Club!

IF YOU'RE A MEMBER

You can start a club with anywhere from four members to more members, all gals your own age and with your own interests. Some clubs meet once a week, some once a month, but all of them get together with big and exciting plans for doing more work, having more fun and more future! How would you like to spend some Friday night soon at a "personality clinic," analyzing and planning smoother clothes, make-up and hair-do's for yourself and your friends? Why not make it a Sub-Deb Club meeting? Or would you and your crowd like to spend your spare evenings sewing doll clothes, making scrapbooks or repainting toys for your local orphanage or children's hospital? Why not make it a Sub-Deb Club meeting? And how about a big old-time boy-girl barn dance with cornstalks in the corners, apple cider and doughnuts, some good Johnny Mercer recordings and more than enough dates to go round? (That should make an interesting evening!) Why not make it a Sub-Deb dance with you on the arrangements committee and right out there dancing in the middle of the floor?

A good Sub-Deb Club is a combination of a lot of things. Some clubs specialize in fun with parties, dances, scavenger hunts, picnics, skating parties and bowling sprees. Others go in for more serious work in community service, lending help to the local hospital or orphanage, working for the Red Cross and other volunteer organizations. And still other clubs concentrate on making themselves the most attractive girls they possibly can be—and devote meetings to personality development, how to wear their hair and clothes, behave on dates and get along with families and friends. And the best clubs do a little of everything. Sounds fun, doesn't it? Then why not form a Sub-Deb Club yourself?

HOW TO BE A CLUB

Select about six of your best friends, girls who you know will have a lot of bright-eyed enthusiasm when it comes to making plans and carrying them through. Go into a serious harpy-huddle and hash over the reasons why you think a Sub-Deb Club is a good idea, just what aims you will have in mind and about how many members you would like to have to start off. Membership should be decided entirely on the basis of friendship and common interests (and since any girl in your school likes to have fun—that's enough "common interest" for membership!). Most Sub-Deb Clubs meet in the homes of the members, rotating on schedule; some have special Sub-Deb clubrooms and others use the recreation rooms of their high schools. So get the gang together somewhere and get down to business. A club name is all-important, so select a name that's easy for others to remember and will stand for your club alone. You can call yourselves The Sub-Deb Club if you want to; you can baffle the rest of your friends with a secret name or choose a combination of letters from the Greek alphabet. Elect a president at the first meeting, or appoint a temporary chairman and postpone elections until you all have had time to discover which gal has the most promising talents for a Mme. President. But do elect a treasurer for club dues, a secretary to keep the club records, and a permanent correspondent. And that's where we come in!

"NO FUNDS—NO FUN!"

It's sad but true. Any club's activities are largely dependent on that comforting sound of cash! Cash in the club treasury and plenty of ideas for investing in fun! So here's the formula for making money and spending it in the new Sub-Deb booklet called FUN AND FUNDS, No. 2225. It's five cents and all requests should be addressed to the Reference Library, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania.

LOOK IN THE LETTER BOX!

Drop us a note here at Sub-Deb headquarters to have your club enrolled as an official member of the National Sub-Deb Club Federation. We'll send you a Sub-Deb Club Handbook, complete with a club constitution and a list of ideas to start your club off on the beam, and a registration blank. When you return the registration blank, filled out with the name of your club and the names and addresses of all members, to Sub-Deb headquarters, you will receive a certificate of membership in the National Federation of Sub-Deb Clubs and an individual membership card to be carried at all times by official members. And your permanent correspondent will receive each month, for the club, a club letter, and a copy of the newspaper, THE SUB-DEB SCOOP, free of charge. It's filled with news of other Sub-Deb Clubs and new ideas for yours, besides poems, stories, articles on good grooming, boy-girl relations and smooth parties—everything to make your club bigger and better! There is no charge for registration or the newspaper. So if you want to have fun and lots of it—make yours a Sub-Deb Club! Let's hear from you!

Your Cold...

the plain truth about it

Can you avoid catching cold?

And if you do catch one is it possible to reduce its severity?

Oftentimes*—YES.

It is now believed by outstanding members of the medical profession that colds and their complications are frequently produced by a combination of factors working together.

1. That an unseen virus, entering through the nose or mouth, probably starts many colds.

2. That the so-called "Secondary Invaders", a potentially troublesome group of bacteria, including germs of the pneumonia and streptococcus types, then can complicate a cold by staging a "mass invasion" of throat tissues.

3. That anything which lowers body resistance, such as cold feet, wet feet, fatigue, exposure to sudden temperature changes, may not only make the work of the virus easier but encourage the "mass invasion" of germs.

Tests Showed Fewer Colds

The time to strike a cold is at its very outset . . . to go after the surface germs before they go after you . . . to fight the "mass invasion" of the tissue before it becomes serious.

The ability of Listerine Antiseptic as a germ-killing agent needs no elaboration. Important to you, however, is the impressive record against colds made by Listerine Antiseptic in tests made over a 12-year period. Here is what this test data revealed:

That those who gargled Listerine Antiseptic twice a day had fewer colds and usually had milder colds, and fewer sore throats, than those who did not gargle with Listerine Antiseptic.

This, we believe, was due largely to Listerine Antiseptic's ability to attack germs on mouth and throat surfaces.

Gargle Early and Often

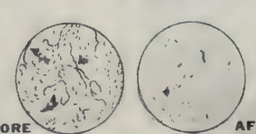
We would be the last to suggest that a Listerine Antiseptic gargle is infallibly a means of arresting an oncoming cold.



However, a Listerine Antiseptic gargle is one of the finest precautionary aids you can take. Its germ-killing action may help you overcome the infection in its early stages.

LAMBERT PHARMACAL COMPANY, St. Louis, Mo.

Germs reduced as much as 96.7%, in tests.

Actual tests showed reductions of bacteria on mouth and throat surfaces ranging up to 96.7% fifteen minutes after the Listerine Antiseptic gargle, and up to 80% one hour after the Listerine Antiseptic gargle.

"Yes, this happened to me!"

—says Mrs. Laurene Donaldson of Connersville, Indiana

The pictures of Mrs. Donaldson at the left were taken by a photographer in her home city—the first, when she weighed 186 and was just starting the DuBarry Success Course; the second, seven months later when she had reduced her weight to 129. Below is the slender, lovely Laurene Donaldson today.

Soldier's wife loses 57 pounds, becomes a slender beauty

"I CAN hardly believe it myself," says Laurene Donaldson, when she looks at these pictures. "It's like being a new person, living in a new world.

"For several years I had been getting heavier, putting on pounds after the birth of each of my children. Finally, I faced the situation. I weighed 186 and had to wear a size 40 dress—at the ripe old age of 26, mind you! I was miserable about my looks and my husband's remarks about my size. Almost in desperation, I decided to find out about the DuBarry Success Course. Frankly, I doubted whether it could help me. But the very first week after I enrolled, I began to look and feel so much better that all those doubts vanished. I went through the course again and again, and in seven months lost 57 pounds.

"Now I wear size 14, find more styles to choose from and for less money. Equally important to me is my increased energy. I feel so buoyant I want to sing again, and I do —all day long!"

HOW ABOUT YOU? Wouldn't you like to be slender again, wear youthful styles, hear the compliments of friends? The DuBarry Success Course can help you. It brings you an analysis of your needs, then shows you how to adjust your weight, remodel your figure, care for your skin, style your hair becomingly, use make-up for glamour —look better, feel better, be at your best. You follow at home the methods taught by Ann Delafield at the famous Richard Hudnut Salon on Fifth Avenue, New York.

Cost Per Child—5c.

Washington, Missouri.

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Gould: Hot meals are served to 440 students of the three Washington public schools daily at 5 cents per meal. Sample menus for two days: Roast beef and gravy, mashed potatoes, fresh sliced tomatoes, bread-and-butter sandwiches, milk. Meat balls and spaghetti in tomato sauce, cabbage slaw, biscuit and butter, milk, raw apple.

Several factors make possible the low price. One is the operation of a vegetable garden by the schools. Another is the reimbursement of 9 cents a meal made by the government. (This program serves also to prevent waste of surplus farm products and to prevent the dropping of prices below the cost of production.) A third factor is the co-operation of retailers and wholesalers.

Three full-time cooks are employed, and six high-school girls help serve. Tickets are sold at 25 cents each, good for five meals. The decrease in price from 10 cents to 5 cents has practically doubled the number of meals served; and teachers and parents feel that the program promotes health and scholarship.

Very truly yours,
C. J. BURGER,
Superintendent, Washington Public Schools.

The latest report from Superintendent Burger shows that 10,152 hot lunches, at 5 cents each, were served in one month; receipts exceeding costs by $11.65!—ED.

Journal Coming Up!

Sandvika, Norway.

Dear Editor: For five long years I have read and reread my few old copies of LADIES' HOME JOURNAL.

We have a tiny farm outside Oslo, producing what we need, and so much for sale that we struggled through. We have been lucky and feel very rich in possession of one cow, a horse, pig, a sheep and some hens—and have also been able to help our family, friends and others.

I think we must have a little more time before we can feel real happiness again, here in Norway, as all over the world. We remember too well the dreadful things done to friends, relations, people we know of. We are a little nation—a big family—and so many of our members were deported, never to come back again. Things we whispered about, and hoped to be rumors, we later read about in the papers in dreadful details.

The day in May when Norway "came to herself," and all our splendid "home boys" suddenly came out in the light, how proud we all felt. From sixteen-years-young boys to gray-haired stern men, we saw them take possession of all important places in their daily suits, and with the Norwegian colors and symbol on their sleeves—how we love them. When our beloved crown prince came back, we had absolutely no voice left at all, and then the foreign troops, the ships, the gift boats. I tell you, after all these years, it is a fairy tale—a dream.

It has now been announced in the newspapers that we each may buy a square of chocolate very soon, so please when may I have my copy of LADIES' HOME JOURNAL?

Yours sincerely,
MRS. ELI LUND.

U. S. A.—Which Style?

The Hague, Netherlands.

Dear Editors: In June, 1940, I received my last copy of the JOURNAL, despite the German occupation and the fact that in that copy was an article against Hitler.

I'm very curious what the JOURNAL is like now. I'm very interested in modern American literature, and have read a lot of books by Hemingway, Dos Passos, Steinbeck, Sherwood Anderson and many others. But sometimes I'm puzzled about the big difference between their stories about life in the U. S. and your point of view.

Thanking you for the pleasant hours given me by the JOURNAL.

Sincerely yours,
MRS. L. LUTHMANN.

50 Million Good Neighbors

Rio de Janeiro, Brazil.

Dear Editor: Could you not tell your readers something about my country and people? We are about 50 million people who have been so lamentably misrepresented and misunderstood.

Walt Disney has carved himself a comfortable niche in our sympathy with his Pluto and the Armadillo, Saludos, The Three Caballeros (even if the words "saludos" and "caballeros" are Spanish and not Portuguese, which is spoken here). Nevertheless, there are a lot of people who still think of Brazilians as mannequins with plastered hair, wild gestures and a preposterous way of losing their tempers.

Yours very, very gratefully,
CRENSA COSTA.

The How America Lives editors are looking forward com muito prazer to the day when they can fly down to Rio!

We Should See to That

Long Beach, California.

Dear Sir: The article you printed, What Made a Hero?, made me furious. The calm assumption that because a man came from a poor family his courage was something to wonder at. What should have been questioned is why didn't this boy with such fine courage have a better chance in life? Schooling, enough to eat and some pleasure.

Sincerely yours,
MRS. RICHARD I. TAYLOR.

Mother of Sixty

Sacramento, California.

Dear Editor: Who would have filled the jobs of working mothers during the war if other women had not cared for thousands of helpless children? In Sacramento alone we have more than three hundred licensed foster mothers. They wear no badge and nothing has ever been mentioned about their part in the war effort; yet the foster mother works twenty-four hours per day. Most of these homes are run on a non-profit basis.

"Mother" Brotzmann and brood.

In the past two years and nine months I have cared for more than sixty children staying with me from one week to more than two and a half years. They were children of people in all walks of life, in all branches of the service, orphans, a number whose parents got into trouble with the law. A few were problem children. Love, a pleasant home and proper care brought them out of that. I could have

My Dear Ladies: I am an old one-legged Presbyterian minister on my way to heaven. This month I stopped long enough to read the JOURNAL—204 pages of beauty and cleverness.

What a change from Ruth Ashmore, when the word "corset" was your editorial taboo! For the fun a mere man gets out of reading your ladylike mag, I say thank you, and sign off with

Still vertically yours,

What's What?

Foley, Alabama.

Dear Sir: I have three questions I've already asked friends, relations—no one seems to know. Maybe we're a bunch of dumb hicks. I don't know.

My questions are: What is meant by left of center? What is center? What's the difference between right and left? I'm bewildered! Truly,

MRS. EARL HARRISON.

Few persons in America will admit they are either "radical," which would be left of center, or "conservative," which would be right of center. The Democratic Party includes in its ranks more radical groups than the Republican Party has. It has none. What is somewhat more surprising is that the most conservative group in America, many of the Southeastern Democrats, are not only included in the Democratic Party but, for years, have been the continuing core of it.

Children Need Children

Akron, Ohio.

Dear Editors: My daughter became ill with rheumatic fever when she was six. For several months now she has appeared as well as anyone, but the doctor has absolutely forbidden strenuous activities because she has an enlarged heart. It is hard for her to realize why other children can run, roller skate, and so on, when she has to sit playing quiet games.

My husband and I play with her, but no amount of reasoning or gifts can make up to a child for child companionship. The thing we really need is understanding on the part of parents. One neighbor said, "You can't expect well children to sit with a sick child." I wonder. We boast of the excellent training we give our youth. Shouldn't children be given this lesson too? If they could only realize the joy they'd bring to a convalescent who looks perfectly well but isn't, by spending part of their regular sitting time with her! And what child doesn't spend a lot of time just sitting around? Sincerely,

"Arrived Safe"

When globe-circling Editor Bruce Gould met Time correspondent Mary (Mrs. Gordon) Tweedy in Calcutta last summer, he heard the nerve-freezing story of her forced parachute jump, during pregnancy, while flying the Himalayas. Happy landings have become a habit in the Tweedy family, with the arrival of Clare Bradford. Progeny, pilot and papa, doing proudly, have moved to Shanghai.

Were Their "Moms" Menaces?

Port Arthur, Texas.

Dear Friends: Too many people fail to see the absurdity of a Scheinfeld basing an attack on mothers upon those of such men as Lincoln, Roosevelt, Truman (how did he miss Washington, who was profoundly influenced by his mother?) and persons who have enriched the world as did Stephen Foster, Byron, Goethe and others. Or who reached success as did Shaw and Belasco.

Would that more mothers might fail thus. Sincerely yours,

L. W. VINSON.

Bachelor Girls?

California.

Dear Editor: We are twenty-two and twenty-four years old; both college graduates. We do not want to be old-maid schoolteachers, but unless we find out what our troubles are, that is surely what we will be. We are average or better in looks, but not the glamour type. Both of us are home-economics majors—one specialized in sewing, and the other in cooking. One of us is an average dancer, the other better than average.

We get along with people very well, but when it comes to young men, it just seems we cannot find anyone who comes up to the standards by which we have been raised. (We are referring to morals.) Are there no young men left who are looking for wives like us? Yours truly,

MARY and ANN SMITH.

Short and Sweet

Patuxent River, Maryland.

Dear Editors: Your magazine seems to be one of the few things that did not deteriorate as a result of the war.

MRS. L. R. MERRILL.

Beaver Falls, Pennsylvania.

Dear Editors: Conscription has brought poverty, ruin and shame to every country that has tried it, because military training makes independent thinking a punishable crime. Shall we adopt the method which has been responsible for the defeat of France, Italy, Germany and Japan?

Sincerely,

RUTH JOHNSON TURNBULL.

Living War Memorials

Yours very truly,

"This Was Our Finest Hour"

Fullerton, California.

Dear Sir: Our community, Fullerton, in Southern California, has completed plans for a living memorial which I feel is perfect.

In one of our lovely hillside parks a grove of sequoia trees is to be planted, one for each boy who gave his life in this war. A slab of sequoia wood from one of the fallen giants from Sequoia National Park is to bear a suitable inscription.

"Out of bounds," Paul said suddenly. "That's what I want put on my tombstone: 'He lived out of bounds.'"

IN the breakfast room Eliza was working magic. It was a very bright blue day with white billowing clouds and a high wind. As Eliza started her oatmeal, a fat cloud came into sight past the beech tree. If it didn't get across the window till she'd finished her oatmeal, she would go to Aunt Pauline's. It began to move very rapidly, changing shape as it came. She dipped into her oatmeal with a zest she seldom showed for food. At the same time, she half wished she might lose. She had been at this same point for a long time now, wishing, wishing her wish to be unfulfilled. It is hard to be not wholehearted about anything when you are a child.

She loved going to Aunt Pauline's. In the first place, Aunt Pauline lived in a place called Yew Valley, and Eliza liked the sound of that name very much. In the second place, Cousin Paul was there, and Cousin Paul was a strange and fascinating boy. In the third place, there was the screen, that she never tired of looking at. And over the whole of Aunt Pauline's household hung an aura of elegance, of efficiency, of worldliness that gave Eliza the feeling of belonging to a most prosperous and aristocratic family. But her mother hated going there—Eliza loved her mother deeply—and so the wish against the wish came into being.

She had known from the moment she had come downstairs this morning that a quarrel was in progress and that it was about going to spend the day in Yew Valley. She had even known how it would come out. She knew she would go; but she wished, too, that just once her mother would win. No one ever did win against her father—no one. But Eliza felt that if only her mother would change her tactics a little, she might win. Already, at nine, Eliza was wiser about some things than her mother. She knew that you couldn't beat her father with passion or anger; you had to keep yourself very still and cold inside, the way he did.

"You never get tired of trying to make a lady out of me, do you, Ned?" That had been what Eliza had heard when she first came down this morning.

Oh, don't! Don't! Eliza had wanted to cry to her mother. It was the kind of thing that could turn her father into real ice. Her father had laughed, but not as if he were amused.

"To tell the truth, I wasn't thinking of you," he had answered. "I just thought I'd like to say good-by to Pauline before we went."

"Yes, and then Pauline can give me a few quiet hints on how to behave in Paris," her mother said.

"Well, she's lived there off and on over the years. You don't know Paris, do you, darling?"

"I'd rather get my education firsthand. And you know very well that you're not going only to say good-by to Pauline. You want Eliza to stay there while we're gone—but she's not going to, no matter what you and Pauline have cooked up between you. She's going to Academyville."

"We haven't 'cooked up' anything between us, as you so elegantly put it. But I certainly think it would be a good idea if Eliza should stay with Pauline. She'd have a good school there, and Paul to play with; your mother's old and strict and Academyville isn't too exciting, is it?"

"It's exciting enough for a child. And the last thing on God's earth I'd want for her is that she get to be a prig like Paul!"

"Paul isn't a prig. He's a very mannerly youngster. . . . Oh, well, suppose we leave that to Eliza."

Eliza realized with a small shock of apprehension how clever that was of her father. Her father knew she preferred staying with Paul, he knew she didn't like going to Academyville. He knew her mother wouldn't dare try to find out which Eliza liked best.

"Leave it to Eliza!" her mother said hotly. "As if she knew what was good for her!"

"So you'd rather condemn Eliza to a lonely winter than let Pauline have her way about anything? You're so maternal!"

Eliza, sitting on the stairs tying her shoes, untying them, tying them again, felt a queer pinched-up feeling inside. That wasn't fair, she knew, and yet she could see how it seemed fair to her father. It wasn't, Eliza knew, that her mother wanted her to be lonely—it was just that she couldn't bear it to have everything decided father's way. If she just wouldn't storm so, if she'd just plan in secret—and yet it was the stormy way she was that made her so beautiful to Eliza. She crept quietly up the carpeted stairs, came down again more noisily, so they'd hear her and stop quarreling. She went out and sat at the table in the breakfast room and Mittie brought her orange juice and oatmeal.

The oatmeal was gone. She looked up quickly and the cloud still showed along one edge. They would go to Yew Valley.

THEY went to Yew Valley. Her mother wore her green velvet dress, by far the most beautiful one she had. It had a soft fichu of cream lace and a ruffle of cream lace at the wrists and going a little way up the sleeves. There were gold studs on the wide belt.

"It isn't a cocktail party," her father said.

"Well, it's Sunday," her mother retorted. "Because we're going to the country doesn't mean that we're riding to hounds or anything, does it? I'm not the tweedy sort and I see no reason to pretend I am."

And there Eliza was again, on that hairline of decision, not knowing which side to be on. She felt such a warm delight, looking at the green velvet dress, and yet she knew, too, that it would not fit in Aunt Pauline's house, that everything would be simpler if her mother would compromise enough to dress in the manner of Aunt Pauline when they went to Yew Valley. And yet why—why shouldn't her mother wear what suited and pleased her? Why should her father always have the final say about good taste? About everything? That was the real point, and Eliza knew this, whether she could have put it into words or not.

They sat, all three, in the front seat, but they didn't talk much. Eliza, sitting in the middle, was the buffer. She absorbed what conversation went on—she was the medium through which it passed. It is not easy, at nine, to be in the middle.

For example, when they passed the Friends' school, her father said, "It's a comforting thought—to know the Friends are still taking such an active and progressive part in education. Looks nice there, doesn't it, chick?" That meant, really, that he wanted Eliza to go to the Friends' school with Paul while he and Eliza's mother were in Europe. It wasn't just a general, impersonal observation.

"It looks just about like the Academyville school, doesn't it, darling?" her mother said. "It's always seemed very funny to me how the snobs, when they want to be especially snobbish, go back to their beginnings, as if they'd just discovered something wonderful. And it's always something plain people have known right along!" Her voice had a passionate scorn and an ugly bitterness in it. She couldn't do it the way father did. She left no doubt that she was being personal—and yet, really, father did the same thing, only more cleverly.

Yew Valley was spread before them. It was a lovely place, old and quiet and hard to get into. People who lived there just took it for granted that they were better, more intelligent than other people. Aunt Pauline hadn't been born there—she had moved there because it was Uncle Robert's home—but she acted now as if it had always been hers. That assumption of Yew Valley citizenship on Aunt Pauline's part infuriated Eliza's mother.

They came to the house. It was set far back from the highway and led up to by a gravel drive lined with big, carefully trimmed apple trees, now heavily loaded with fruit. Outside the drive, at either end of the house, stood a huge holly tree. Eliza never saw these holly trees without a sense of excitement. Holly was something you saw in wreaths at Christmastime. Trees of holly were rare, extraordinary possessions that gave you a special quality just by being the possessor. They were like Paul, very beautiful and strange, with sharp points that hurt and yet were at the same time exciting.

Uncle Robert came to the door himself. Eliza didn't like him much, but she didn't think about him much. Her mother had once called him, in Eliza's presence, a "stuffed shirt." Eliza didn't know exactly what that meant, but she thought it appropriate, all the same. He never said anything that counted.

"GLAD to see you, Ned—Julia," he said now heartily. "So you're leaving us soon? Come along in—Pauline'll be down directly. Eliza, you'll find Paul out by the pond, I think."

Eliza wanted to go and wanted not to at the same time. She didn't want to be told what to do by Uncle Robert. By obeying, she made herself beaten the same way her mother was beaten by the Griggs family. But she wanted terribly to see Paul and she went out through the sun porch that stretched across half the house at the back, and down the slope toward the pond. She saw him stretched out at the edge of it with a stick in his hands, and had a small rush of resentment toward him for not having been at the house to welcome her. It was like Aunt Pauline's being upstairs. But she loved Paul very, very much, so she ran down the slope, and only walked more slowly when she was quite near him.

He didn't turn even when he knew she was close.

"Hello," she said, but she said it flatly, not eagerly at all.

He pulled himself up on an elbow. "Oh—hello."

He was beautiful, Cousin Paul. A slender, graceful boy with fine, curly dark hair and great brown eyes that looked at you very directly and told nothing. Eliza was at once filled, as she always was at such moments, with a desire to impress him. She sat down in the grass beside him, crossing her legs.

"My father and mother are going to Paris—Paris, France," she bragged.

"How do you suppose mermaids breathe in water?" Paul asked, entirely ignoring this exciting information, which of course he knew already.

"There aren't any, really," Eliza said.

"How do you know? As a matter of fact"—Paul used a phrase he was very fond of at the time—"there's one in the pond here. I've seen her."

"Silly!"

Paul was looking at her speculatively. It was a look she knew and feared. "You're the silly one," he said. "And you just the same as called me a liar."

"I didn't. But mermaids are just in Hanschristianandersen."

"But I said I saw one. Right in the middle of the pond. As a matter of fact, I saw her this morning."

"How did you get out there?"

"On the raft. As a matter of fact, she looked like you, except her hair was yellow. I don't think she was grown up, quite."

"Mermaids are always grown up," Eliza retorted. "Always."

"How do you know if you never saw one? If I say she was little, she was little. I was going to show her to you—but if you don't even believe she's there ——"

Eliza stared at the water. The world was so still and golden. Like a dream in which anything could happen. She had a feeling as of being enchanted, but it was a queer enchantment, half evil, half good. She had been enchanted by Paul before and she knew the sensation quite well. She always intended to resist it—she never did.

She made one more effort. "You can't see into the pond, anyway."

"Some days you can. She wears a gold chain around her neck."

The little mermaid began to come real. "Where would she get a gold chain from?" Eliza asked practically, but her voice was growing thin and strange.

There's no denying that love can be a tightrope. Sometimes, though, it's wisest to lose your balance.

WHAT SHE WANTED WAS A WHOLE LIFE, IN ONE PIECE, WITH ONE PERSON.

ILLUSTRATED BY JON WHITCOMB

"I don't feel sorry for myself," said Nancy. "I simply get hungry for a little appreciation every now and then!"

THEY'D been married a little over a year when Joel came to the conclusion that women put entirely too much stock in love and romance. Apparently it wasn't enough that a man went to work every day, stayed sober and didn't chase after other women; he also had to be a fount of romantic sentiment, gushing at frequent intervals. Joel couldn't gush, and said so.

"I don't want you to gush," Nancy replied, dusting a pottery lamp. "All I'd like is a kind word now and then. But getting you to say something nice is like pulling teeth."

Joel grunted, as much in reply as from the strain of lifting the radio over the edge of the drugget so Nancy could vacuum behind it.

"You have such nice shoulders," Nancy said, stopping to watch. "Especially when you're so tan."

He was working stripped to the waist, partly because it was hot and partly—to be perfectly honest—because this wasn't the first time Nancy had admired his shoulders.

"They'll do," he said modestly. But he swaggered ever so slightly.

It was Saturday afternoon and they were cleaning their still very new three-room apartment. Joel worked at the bank until one, so they did it in the afternoon when he could help. Nancy had Saturdays off and usually devoted the mornings to week-end shopping and washing her clothes.

"Joel, you still love me, don't you?"

"Certainly."

"Then why don't you say so occasionally?"

"It seems to me I do more than just say it. Do I ever miss a day's work? Don't I give you my whole pay? Do I ever get drunk or fool around with other women?"

Nancy sighed and crawled under the table.

"You ought to be married to some husbands I know," Joel continued in tones of righteous reproof.

"I know. You're so wonderful."

Complacently: "I've seen worse."

Nancy sniffed.

Imprisoned among what the furniture salesman had assured them were Duncan Phyfe legs with brass tips, Nancy dusted assiduously, while Joel stood the couch cushions on end.

"I suppose you'd like me to talk like a movie hero and kiss your hand every time I see you," Joel said. "Why you women put so much stock in just words is something I'll never understand."

Nancy came out from under the table and sat back on her heels. She was wearing shorts and a halter, and she'd put up her hair in pigtails for coolness. She looked, Joel thought, utterly charming and absurdly young. Characteristically, it didn't occur to him to tell her so.

"Would it be just words if you said you loved me and paid me a compliment now and then?" she demanded.

"No, but ——"

"You think that I keep myself looking nice, don't you? You appreciate the way I plan the meals and darn your socks and stick to our budget, don't you?"

"Sure, but ——"

"Then for heaven's sake why not tell me so? I don't want you to be making up pretty speeches that don't mean anything. Just tell me how you really feel about me once in a while."

"But doggone it, you know how I feel about you. Just because I don't say so every ten minutes doesn't mean I've stopped loving you. I don't change that easily."

Nancy gave him an enigmatic look. "I've found that out."

She got to her feet. Joel gazed appreciatively at her legs. He'd never known a girl with more beautiful legs, and after some fifteen months of seeing them every day he still enjoyed looking at them.

"I'll tell you what I think part of the trouble is," he said. "Movies and love stories and even soap advertisements fill a girl so full of the idea that the most important thing in the world is love and romance, that when she gets married she expects it to be one long love scene. And when she finds out it isn't, she starts feeling sorry for herself."

"I don't feel sorry for myself. I simply get hungry for a little appreciation now and then."

"What gives you the idea you're not being appreciated?"

"What's the nearest thing to a compliment I ever get around here?" she retorted. "I'll tell you. I know it by heart." Striking a pose, she lifted bored eyebrows and imitated Joel's drawl to perfection: "'Not bad.' That's all I ever get. 'Not bad.' Or a pat on the fanny."

"Say, it's not every girl I pat on the fanny." And chuckling like a young man highly pleased with himself, Joel carried three ash trays and a sheaf of old newspapers into the kitchen.

Trays and newspapers disposed of, he got out their tank-type vacuum cleaner—reconditioned good as new—and removed the dust bag, then climbed to the roof to empty it into a paper bag.

When he returned, Nancy was gazing warily at the cleaner. "There's something the matter with this switch," she said. "I touched it and got a shock."

"Probably a loose connection."

"Shouldn't we take it to the repairman?"

"I think I can fix it."

He got a screw driver and pliers and took the switch apart, resecured a raveled, loosened wire and put it together again, while Nancy sat on the floor watching everything he did. He slid in the flat plug, pushed the switch and the cleaner whirred into life.

"You're so smart," Nancy said admiringly.

"It doesn't take any special smartness to do a job like that." Still, he felt pleased.

"But you seem to know how to do so many things."

"Oh, I'm quite a handy person to have around."

While Nancy vacuumed, Joel cleaned the bathroom and kitchen. Being instinctively a good workman and quite as proud of their home as Nancy, he did a thorough job; and being a thoughtful young man, he wondered if Nancy's occasional dissatisfactions might not be based on something more substantial than normal feminine perversity. She wasn't the kind who talked just to make a noise. Girls were notable for getting queer ideas, but Nancy wasn't like most girls. She was so unlike most girls, in fact, that he'd married her.

They finished about the same time, Joel wiping off the sink as Nancy was putting the cleaner away in the hall closet. She came into the kitchen and dropped on a chair.

Joel got a bottle of ginger ale out of the refrigerator. "Want some?"

"Just a mouthful. What I really want is a bath. I feel so sticky I don't like myself."

Joel poured. "This is the part of cleaning house I like best."

The ginger ale stung his taste buds—cold and delicious.

Nancy gazed over the edge of her glass at the spotless kitchen. "It does look nice when it's all cleaned up, doesn't it?"

"M-m-m."

"You're so good about helping me, too, after working at the bank all week."

"You work all week, too, don't you?"

"But most men would leave it all to their wives, or get indignant and say it was women's work."

"It's just as much my home as yours. I like to see it looking good too."

"I know, but most men don't look at it that way."

"I don't say there might not have been a time when I'd have hated to be caught doing something like this. But as I told Richie"—Richie was Nancy's brother—"I've got better ways of showing I'm a man than by letting my wife mop the floors."

"Richie has no sense." She rose. "I'm going to jump in the tub."

She was breast-deep in water that was a pale green with bath salts when he entered the bathroom. He examined himself in the medicine-chest mirror, sliding a hand over his face. "I don't really need a shave, but I suppose I ought to, seeing as how I'm going out tonight with my best girl."

"Meaning me?"

"Uh-huh."

Nancy slid deeper into the water, lifted out one knee and beamed, soaping it.

Joel began smearing brushless cream on his face. "Think our budget can stand a soda after the movie?"

"Of course, Joel. We're not that poor."

"Well, we had the furniture this week. And next week's the rent."

"You'd be surprised how I've learned to squeeze that budget. I'm getting so economical it's a sin."

They'd have needed to squeeze it lots harder if Nancy hadn't kept her job, Joel reflected, drenching his razor with hot water. Some girls insisted on quitting as soon as they married, but Nancy had raised no objections whatever to working at least until their furniture was paid for. She'd get all the staying home she wanted, she said, when she had a baby. With luck, that might be next year. Scraping, Joe tried to imagine Nancy with a baby, himself a father. The effort merely made him dizzy, so he stopped.

Nancy pulled the plug and stepped out on the bath mat. "Are you going to take a bath or a shower?"

"Shower. Sitting-down baths are for girls." He had his shower and dressed. (Continued on Page 137)

WHAT IS CIVILIZATION?

By Will Durant

Will civilization survive the partnership of science with modern warfare—or are we building our future on a living volcano? Will our children see the suicide of civilization or a brave new world? asks the man who wrote The Story of Philosophy.

"I THANK the gods," said Plato, "that I was born a Greek and not a barbarian, a man and not a woman, and in the days of Socrates."

Even a philosopher's thinking is two thirds prejudice. The Greeks called all non-Greeks barbaroi, probably meaning babblers, people of uncouth speech. The word was flagrantly unjust, for Egyptian, Babylonian, Hebrew and Persian were highly developed languages in Plato's days. The "barbarian," knowing the zest of cool air on the naked body, sleeping under the stars and living under the sun, earning or making his bread with the toil of his hands, unhampered by laws and unspeeded by machines, innocent of cities or factories, dispensing with books but loving song and dance, educating his children fondly to a hundred useful skills, and killing in a thousand years as many men as a civilized person can kill in a day—such a "barbarian" might reasonably laugh at "civilization," and dismiss it as the prejudice of all prejudices, the conceit of all conceits.

Every nation has exaggerated the splendor of its own culture, and has underestimated that of others. Every vigorous people thinks itself the chosen people. This collective egotism is as necessary as individual egotism.

We of the United States are no exception to the rule of national conceit. We have our excuses: our democracy has given us for a century more liberty than any other people has ever enjoyed; our economic system has produced wealth more abundantly, and distributed it more widely, than any other system or country in history; our educational system has opened the doors of opportunity to every mind in every rank—almost; our freedom of thought and speech, of press and worship has withstood all assaults of obscurantism and bigotry; and the zest and camaraderie of our life come like an electric charge to any people that makes contact with American youth.

And yet—our economic system normally leaves a substantial minority of our people in poverty and slums; our democracy is tarnished with occasional corruption, incompetence and waste; our educational system gives us more skill than wisdom, more cleverness than character; our freedom has a string on it, and does not deter us from racial discrimination and hostility; we lead the semicivilized world in divorce and crime; our music is barbarous, our art (except architecture) is mere groping, our literature has deteriorated since Emerson. We destroy historic cities, architectural masterpieces and noncombatant populations with indiscriminate air raids, and kill 60,000 men, women and children at one blow. We love our civilization, and our enemies call us Huns.

What is civilization? Does it admit of objective, impartial definition? How do the people of the earth today rank in the degree and quality of their civilization? Is our civilization doomed by its own science?

The Constituents of Civilization

Civilization is order and freedom promoting cultural activity.

Order is civilization's first law, and the mother of freedom, as chaos is civilization's last travail, and the mother of dictatorship.

Four forms of order are needed for civilization: biological, political, economic, moral.

Biologically: there must be order in the relations of the sexes and the generations. The family—which is the biological nucleus of civilization—pursues this aim through marriage and parental care. Marriage is an unnatural institution, whose original purpose was to secure economically an economic helpmate, but whose modern purpose is to channel within orderly limits unreasoning impulses that might otherwise tear a society to pieces. A low birth rate marks a high civilization. Public services of health and sanitation, by lessening illness and mortality, are a major contribution to civilization.

Politically: there must be protection for life, labor, enterprise and property, and for the society as a whole. Primitively the tribe and the clan achieved this through kinship rule and custom; usually in civilization it is accomplished by the state through regional government and laws. Since internal disorder or external attack may destroy a state, we must reckon a police force and an army as indispensable appurtenances of civilization.

Economically: there must be order in the production and distribution of desirable goods; in their secure transport—the history of civilization is in one aspect the history of the wheel; in their provident storage and safe exchange; in the provision of capital to finance these operations; and in the relations of the groups or classes of men and women engaged in these operations.

Morally: a civilization requires order in the conduct and relations of men. Civilization is artificial; the order it entails runs counter to our most powerful impulses. Our individualistic instincts of acquisition and pugnacity, our racial instinct of indiscriminate mating, are stronger than our social inclinations to associate and imitate and conform; these last must be encouraged, the others must be controlled, to ensure the order that makes civilization possible.

Here again the family is the nucleus of civilization. Parental discipline and fraternal strife smooth the projecting corners (Continued on Page 103)

Henry A. Wallace

You can't pick the most civilized nation by a score card, any more than you can pick the best dairy cow by a score card. When dairymen abandoned the score card and began to depend rather on the milk scales, their emphasis was shifted from "static form" to "dynamic function." If we wish to discover the significant civilizations of the future, we must place the dominant emphasis on "dynamic function." Measured by dynamic function, the United States undoubtedly stands first, Russia second and England third, with France and a number of other nations in a tie for fourth. The Durant score card puts the Scandinavian countries second. I would share with him a strong admiration for these countries, but would rank alongside of them, or at any rate only a short distance behind, Holland, Belgium, New Zealand and Australia. Germany and Japan in the future can, if they will, be in the same category with these countries. But none of these countries has in it the dynamic power to influence world civilization such as is possessed by the big three.

(If I were using Durant's score card I would find it hard to avoid getting an answer very similar to that which he gets. However, I would find it necessary to include Switzerland, Holland, Belgium, New Zealand and Australia and give them a score not far behind the Scandinavian countries. As a guide to the future I find the Durant score card misleading, and that is why I propose an approach based on dynamic functionalism.)

Forgetting national boundaries, let us look for a moment at civilizations on the basis of racial cultures. The Latin civilization is undoubtedly the mother of the Anglo-Saxon Germanic culture. We Anglo-Saxons have a right to be proud of our mother, but we cannot disregard the enormous élan vital of the Slavic races. When distinguished Latins of the last century like De Tocqueville and De Hostos, perceived so clearly the great future of the Slavic culture, we of the twentieth century would be foolish to ignore the inevitably great contribution the Slavs will make to the future of civilization.

As I look into the future, I also have great faith in the eventual development of great civilizations in Latin America and China. These developments will depend in large measure on how well we in the United States measure up to our opportunity for world leadership during the years immediately ahead. If we fail in the task, the Slavic culture will dominate the twenty-first century as certainly as the Anglo-Saxon Germanic civilization dominated the latter part of the nineteenth century and the early twentieth. All this I say not in a spirit of promoting competition between cultures, but rather for the purpose of suggesting friendly emulation in world-wide co-operation, looking toward the raising of the standard of living of all peoples.

I found no reason to quarrel with the author. The article is no more and pretends to be no more than an ingenious, entertaining and historically well-founded contribution examining the degree of civilization of the different nations from various points of view. . . . If there is one objection I'd like to make, it is this: that Mr. Durant has too greatly limited the number of states to be examined. He has completely left out Italy and Switzerland. One doesn't see why. The smallness of Switzerland is no excuse, since he has included the Scandinavian countries. Considering the fact that the world owes its entire musical and commercial terminology to Italy, and taking into account the high degree of civilization prevailing in Switzerland and demonstrated by its unexcelled schools, hospitals, and so on, one must regard the exclusion of these two countries as an injustice. Who knows how many points the old culture of Italy and the oldest European democracy, Switzerland, would have scored!

I once said to myself that the test of Civilization—which to save space I shall call C—was having leisure to define it. I see little room for dissent from the framework Durant sets up. He expressly repeats his "diffidence" in judging. Anyone who rebukes or reproaches must remember his basic axiom, that C exists by geological consent. It is too often forgotten that barometer and thermometer are two of the telltales of C. Order, Durant keeps saying, is at the bottom of C, and certainly the climates of Britain and Scandinavia are more orderly than our own; hence, partly, their higher score. . . . Humanity, so jealously competitive, will spring upon his score sheet, which is the least important part of this fine essay. What I should like to see in large, bold type are his suggestions for present statesmanship.

Civilization is a crust over the prevalent turbulence of mankind. The crust is thin, and its occasional promises of permanence (so far as one may judge from history) always false. But sometimes the promise is plausible; the crust feels almost firm; and then, for a little while, men build more than they destroy. The Romans did; so did the cathedral builders of Christendom; so did our railway-building forefathers a century ago. For whether one serves God or Mammon, an act of building is an act of faith, and the last of the world's great mass-building efforts was one that bore witness to a general belief that the world was "improving."

If we doubt this today, it is with reason reinforced by the sad declension in values of the three basic inventions of our past century—first, the railway (almost wholly peaceful), then the airplane (half apt for war and half for peace), and now atomic energy, which, so far as uses for it have yet been found, is wholly and catastrophically destructive.

To seek a listing of modern nations in regard to the quality of their civilization is to beg the more crucial question of whether the world today is in any true sense civilized at all. If we do beg it, however, such a listing of nations will only show that the highest "civilization" was reached and is currently retained by those countries that, either by luck or contrivance, escaped the worst ravages of two world wars.

I would therefore nominate as follows: Switzerland and Sweden (sheer luck); the United States (size, which is also luck); Britain; France; Germany; Russia (a hard case: her Czarist civilization was mediocre; what followed is still in birth pangs); China (the saddest of all the war victims).

I think it possible that in 100 years the balance between constructive and destructive activities of mankind will have swung to the former again. And as a wild guess I would forecast the world's greatest cities then as Johannesburg, Los Angeles, São Paulo (Brazil), and Alma-Ata (Siberia).

André Maurois

I accept Will Durant's definition of civilization, though I would prefer a simpler one: the art and science of living in a society. I agree with most of his conclusions as to what an ideal government should do to preserve civilization. But I completely disagree with the way in which he applies his tests to rate the leading nations. . . . It is arbitrary, and to me unacceptable, to attribute the same value to the various factors of civilization: culture, freedom, economic order, biological order. I do not think Mr. Durant listed the nations correctly, because no one could list them correctly. France is neither first, nor third, nor sixth. She is France, not better than Britain or the United States, but just as necessary to world civilization, though for different reasons.

Jacques Barzun

Mr. Durant's epigram on civilization as "order and freedom promoting cultural activity" is one of the briefest and best things that have been said on the subject. I agree with everything he says up to the point where he begins to wreck his own definition by playing with the notion of testing and rating national cultures.

He admits that this is "reckless play," but I wonder whether he knows how reckless it is, for having shown order to be chiefly a means to culture, he falls into the trap of equating the two. An example, taken from sport, will illustrate what I mean. That graceful and lethal aspect of American civilization known as skiing is something we borrowed from Central Europe; it has spread from Switzerland, where Conan Doyle had done most to introduce the art after its first emergence in Norway. The remoter origins of the snow skid take us back to the ancient Scythians. The question is, to which nationality do we credit skiing—not forgetting that Conan Doyle was Scotch-Irish?

I have purposely caricatured Mr. Durant's assumption: the sober way to put the matter is to say that no historian can for a moment admit as many "civilizations" as Mr. Durant talks about in his confusion between passing political forms and cultural activity. In the western world there is but one civilization, the European, which began in Greece and Asia Minor long ago. Since then, the additions and interminglings are beyond computation, and it is a mole's-eye view to try comparing local variations at the expense of the underlying unity established by Rome, by Christendom and by the industrial revolution. . . . Anyone is at liberty to match nationalities, preferring buttered toast to sauerkraut or proclaiming in a patriotic voice that American hotels are the only ones that supply ice water free of charge. But the pastime must not be mistaken for a judgment about civilizations.

By Gertrude Schweitzer

SHE came into the house from school, banging the screen door, yelling, "Hi, mom, I'm home!" and clumping up the stairs to her room, all in one unbroken pattern of sound and motion. If her mother had not answered her, she would have paused to investigate. As it was, the familiar expected voice barely registered on the surface of her brain, suggesting that everything was normal.

As soon as she had reached her room and disposed of her books, she pulled off her cotton school dress and slip and threw them down on the bed. She put on a pair of wrinkled dungarees and a man's old, frayed white shirt, rolling the dungaree legs up to her knees and the sleeves of the shirt up to her elbows, and letting the shirttail hang out long and wide.

Up to this point, her costume was not unusual. In common with thousands of other American girls, she now, standing in her nice, comfortable, warm home, before her well-filled clothes closet, presented the pitiable picture of a child whom need has forced to wear her big brother's inappropriate, unbecoming, outgrown garments.

But from there on, her uniform deviated. She wore no charm bracelets, no jewelry at all except a wrist watch. Her thick, dark hair was short, and its wind-blown appearance had been achieved not with shears, bobby pins or curlers, but by the blowing of the wind. And there was no lipstick on her wide, upcurving mouth, no lipstick at all.

A moment later she tore down the stairs again, carrying a fishing rod and whistling shrilly and tunelessly. In the hall she skidded to a stop just short of colliding violently with her mother.

"Oops!" she said, grinning. "Sorry!" She stood with her legs wide apart, the fishing rod on her shoulder, towering over her small, dainty mother. "I'm going fishing with Skeet. Be back for supper."

"Frances, you haven't forgotten?" Her mother's smile was brilliant, charming. "Beth's party tonight?"

"Ohmigosh! Do I have to go?"

"Of course, dear. How could you not go to your cousin's sixteenth-birthday party—an event like that?"

"Suppose I was sick. If I was sick I couldn't go."

"But you aren't sick," her mother said firmly, "and I'm sure you aren't going to be sick." A strained heartiness came into her voice. "Besides, it's going to be a lovely party, and I'm sure you'll have a wonderful time."

The girl shrugged. "I never do," she said cheerfully. "I never have a wonderful time at parties."

"You might," the mother said, "if you only weren't so ——" She paused and looked her daughter up and down and made a helpless gesture with her small hands, not finishing the sentence.

But the girl, walking along the road with her fishing rod to meet Skeet, knew exactly what her mother meant. She was a tall, lanky girl with hard muscles, a long, swinging stride and a deep, slightly hoarse voice, and she knew that it was a constant shock to her mother that she was not, instead, small and fluffy and soft-spoken—the kind of girl her mother must have been. She was sorry she was such a disappointment, but she would not have changed into a girl like that if she could. It was bad enough to be any kind of girl, when boys were the ones who did all the things that were fun, but at least she wasn't one of those silly, giggling idiots.

As though to illustrate her point, a battered-up jalopy clattered by her on the road, and her cousin Beth called to her in a high-pitched, affected voice, and then turned to the boy next to her and giggled, for no reason at all. Beth's hair was a long, golden, gently curling cascade around her shoulders, and her mouth was a vivid flash of laughing red, and her eyes, looking up at the boy, were meltingly soft.

The girl watched them pass. Then she picked up a pebble and tossed it strongly through the trees, admiring the length of the throw. In another year she would be sixteen herself, but she would never be like Beth, mooning at a boy that way. People would be after her even more then, telling her a girl of sixteen had to act grown-up and ladylike, talking about boys in that sly, sidelong way they had that they thought was funny, but she wouldn't care. She was going to be different. Maybe she would be a flier, and fly planes all over the world—make records, like Amelia Earhart and those—and when she jumped out of her plane, tall and agile in her pilot suit, she would take off her cap and goggles and smile at the assembled crowd, and they would gasp and say:

"A girl! Can you believe it—a girl! Who would have thought a girl could fly a plane that way?"

A long, low whistle distracted her from thoughts of the future. She returned the whistle, slid through an indiscernible gap in the bushes and came out upon the edge of a pond, where a boy sat dangling a slack fishing line in the water.

"Hi, Skeet!" she greeted him, meanwhile readying her own equipment. "How they biting?"

"Not so good, Frankie," he said. His voice was still in an alarming state of transition, although he was old enough for it to have settled down, and its strange hoarseness, alternating with sudden shrill squeaks, had given rise to the rumor that he had once swallowed a mosquito which had bitten him in the throat. Hence the nickname.

The girl sat down beside him, unflinchingly impaled a worm upon her hook, and threw her line into the water. They did not speak again, after their exchange of greetings, until they knocked off for a snack. Then Skeet said, between bites of peanut-butter sandwich:

"They're after me to go to Beth Calvert's dance tonight."

"Who's after you?"

"Oh, you know—ma and Mrs. Calvert and Beth. They're low on guys, so they want me to go." He screwed up a long, freckled nose and rubbed one square brown hand over his sun-bleached hair. "What would I do at a dance, tell me that? I got no use for women, and all that stuff."

"I've got to go too," she said. "On account of Beth being my cousin, I can't get out of it. But I don't see why you ——"

He grimaced. "Yeah, I don't see why either. But ma and Mrs. Calvert are friends, and ma thinks this would be helping her out." He gave a short, bitter laugh. "She should know what a help I'll be at a dance!"

They both stared moodily at the water. "Well, anyway," Frankie said, "we can kind of stick together."

Frankie grimaced at herself in Beth's mirror. It seemed to her that she looked as uncomfortable and unnatural as she felt, but actually the long white dress was very becoming, its billowing skirt covering her lanky legs, rounding her bony lines, the tight-fitting bodice emphasizing her strong slimness. There was in her movements none of the conscious awkwardness that harried some of the other girls, but a kind of free-swinging, wild, boyish grace that was softened by the flowing dress.

Frankie saw none of this. She saw only an absurd, artificial femininity—something deceptive, of which she wanted no part. She belonged in a shirt and dungarees, lying on the bank of a pond with a fishing pole—not here at a dance, mincing around in this silly dress.

"My, you look nice!" Beth's voice was sirupy—the special voice she reserved to be overheard by boys. "Your gown is sweet!" Her smile was supercilious, her eyes patronizing the white dress. Her own dress was an unrelieved black, close-fitting, deeply cut—a sixteen-year-old dream of a dress.

"Thanks," Frankie answered in her clipped, husky voice. "I don't feel sweet—I feel like a dope. Let's go."

"My goodness, you sound as if you're going to be tortured or something." Beth led her into a room filled with boys and girls. "You know almost everybody, don't you? You'd think they were going to bite you."

It was true that Frankie knew almost everybody—but not on these terms, not all dressed up like this. a girl among boys, a girl who looked sweet. They were the same boys with whom she had gone (Continued on Page 96)

YET NOT BE ALLOWED TO HAVE EVEN SO MUCH AS A NIBBLE ★ BY GEE HARGROVE

"MINNA," I said in the tone of One Who Has Suffered—Minna is a coworker of mine with an equine countenance and a fourteen-carat heart—"this has been a witch of a day."

And so it had. A screaming-meemie of a day, starting with my leaving my cosmetic kit at home and having to use a weird orange lipstick of Minna's, and ending now after two solid hours of dictation from Mr. Michelovsky, who strains a robust Russian accent between clenched stumps of teeth and a noisome pipe. And the in-between had all been part of the maddening pattern: an important carbon in wrong side to with Michelovsky doing heavy ballet waiting for the original; Smithy smiling her feline smile as she asked wonderingly whether I'd applied that lipstick with a toothbrush; I even got stuck between floors in the elevator for twenty minutes of my lunch hour, and me a claustrophobe.

Oh, a witch of a day indeed. I sighed with a desperate thankfulness as I dragged on my gray jacket at five-fifteen. 'Mid pleasures and palaces, my thoughts ran. Maybe mother'd had enough points for lamb chops after all. Even if it was meat loaf again, there was coffee gelatin for dessert. I'll stop at Petit Paris for some of those pastry butterflies. And after dinner I'll just loll like a rag doll. I was so lulled by these soothing thoughts that even the hour's ride on the subway couldn't cause my good humor, creeping cautiously out of its lair, to retreat.

Still, I retained a certain amount of wariness. It's been my bitter experience that a sadistic day like that doesn't usually drop me obediently out of its maw at five-fifteen. It wasn't, in fact, until I opened the door and sniffed the divine scent of broiling lamb chops—some perfume manufacturer should patent it—that I dared to relax completely.

MOTHER kissed me fondly over the potato masher. "Hello, darling. You look gaunt. Or is it just that ghastly lipstick? Your jacket's buttoned wrong. Here, darling, give these potatoes a final whip while I answer the phone. Don't forget the warm milk and the dash of salt."

She was back in a jiffy—a noble deed, for mother dearly loves telephonic chitchat, and a half hour is her usual minimum. But the keen maternal eye discerned that I'd had my quota of that day's raveled sleave of care. She gave me a tender pat on the derrière.

"I've drawn your bath, little one." (Mother is five-two in heels to my five-eight.) "I'll have dinner on the table as soon as you're ready."

"Mother," I intoned solemnly, kissing the top of her askew feathercut, "you are out of this world."

"Is that good?" she smirked exaggeratedly. "Use my geranium oil," she called after me. "It lifts the morale like a derrick."

As I stood rubbing myself to a glow with the outsize blue bath towel, I felt like the Ancient Mariner right after the albatross had slipped off. Life, I thought Edgar Guestishly, is once more bright-hued and home brings surcease from trouble.

I CLIMBED into my trusty dungarees—the ones with the white patch on each knee from the day I scrubbed the kitchen floor with bleaching water—and my brother Jed's old checked shirt, leaving the tail out in a truly sharp manner. I had scrubbed off every vestige of the misbegotten tangerine lipstick, and came to the table shining-faced, sans a smitch of make-up, and with my hair pulled into two pigtails tied with red ribbon à la Judy Canova.

Mother refrained from comment beyond a mild, "Well, darling, you certainly look wholesome."

"That's me," I agreed cheerfully. "Neat."

It was during my second helping of coffee gelatin that she reminded me that tonight was the night for the Red Cross bridge. This, I said to myself, gets better and better. Solitude. Blissful, all-by-myself solitude. Not that I don't adore mother, but it's only when she's not around that I can play my records in peace. She simply cannot understand music as anything but a pleasant background for conversation, and she says it makes her nervous to see me sitting like a brass monkey—her very expression—during something like Clair de Lune.

Bursting with good cheer and three lamb chops, I helped her whiz into her black eyelet, picked out the turquoise choker and bracelet she wears with it, told her by all means the small hat and no, positively not another dab of rouge. Then I closed the door after her and waited the usual five minutes. Sure enough, within the specified time, I heard the agitated tapping of returning spike heels and pulled the door open again.

"Would you, darling?" she called out breathlessly. "On my vanity chair, the two cans of oysters I promised Mrs. McCann." She sat briefly on the hassock. Mother's incurably superstitious; she always sits down when she comes back for something. We've had that hassock re-covered three times.

I raced back with the oysters, kissed her good-by again and, this time, closed the door with finality. Mother has never been known to come back twice, just as she's never been known to leave once.

I hustled through the dishes, having had the good sense to leave them soaking in hot soapy water. I've had experience with cold lamb-greased dishes before. Then, then . . . the evening stretched unshackled before me. I was squatting in front of the record cabinet, choosing my entertainment when the doorbell rang. I sat with Morton Gould's Pavanne clutched to my bosom. Maybe if I didn't move, or breathe, or even consciously think—just maybe whoever it was would go away. Half a minute snailed past and I said to myself, The light, you fool. Of course they'd see the light under the door. I snarled softly as I padded to open it on the second for-heaven's-sake-answer-it peal. Dear God, not an evening of Dora Hollis and that Ouija board. Then I heard the bark. Not Dora, praise the Lord. Rover.

YOU heard me. I said Rover. Jed bought him and named him uncompromisingly. No Sean or Brian Boru or Kevin Barry, even if he was an Irish setter. Basic English for this dog. Things had come to a pretty pass, Jed maintained, when people used dogs and houses in Connecticut as pegs on which to hang their whimseys. He pitied the animal whose fey owners explained with a pixy laugh, "We call him Cassius because he hath a lean and hungry look."

I reached the door in two bounds. My sister Pat was standing there with a weekend case in one hand and Rover's leash in the other. My niece Penny immediately wrapped herself boa-constrictor style around my stomach just as though she hadn't seen me night before last.

"Midge, would you mind awfully? It's Ted's mother again—another heart attack. I hate to ask you. But it's practically Penny's bedtime anyhow, and she won't be too much trouble really."

My sister Pat is a replica of mother, only with gorgeous red hair. She's a cute thing and she looked so worried and apologetic that I told her that Penny looked like a day in the country compared with the Ouija board I'd expected. I sent her on her way with my blessing and a promise to make Penny take her halibut oil.

She was back three minutes later—I told you she's like mother—with a two-pound box of fudge. "Here, Midge. I forgot to give you this. Only one piece for Penny, though. You're a positive angel not to crab, Midge." She grazed the hassock swiftly, hugged Penny hard and dashed off.

Two Homes in One

YOU CAN SEE FROM THE GARDEN SIDE HOW NICELY TWO HOUSES CAN MAKE A SINGLE HOME GROUP FOR A LARGE FAMILY, IN-LAWS OR RELATIONS, OR BE TWO INDEPENDENT HOUSES

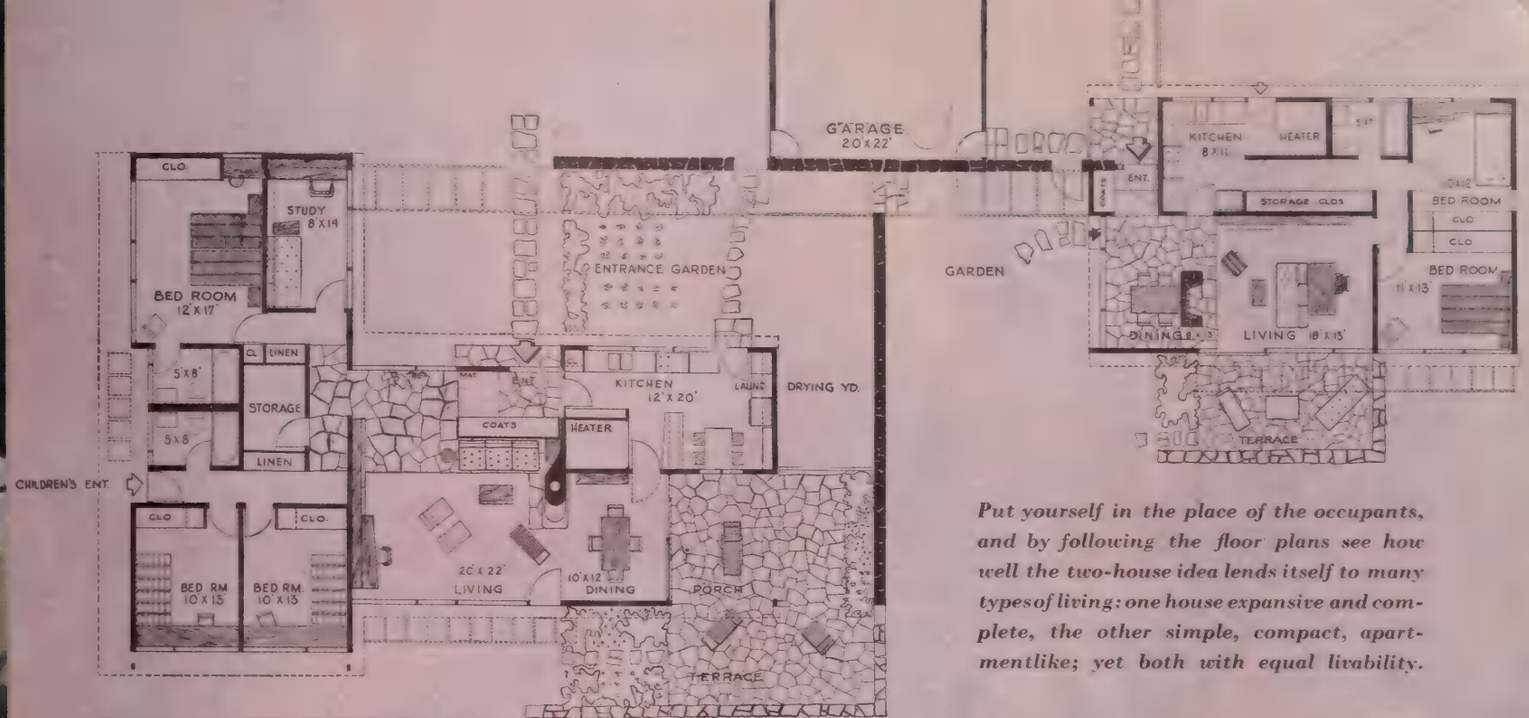
By Richard Pratt

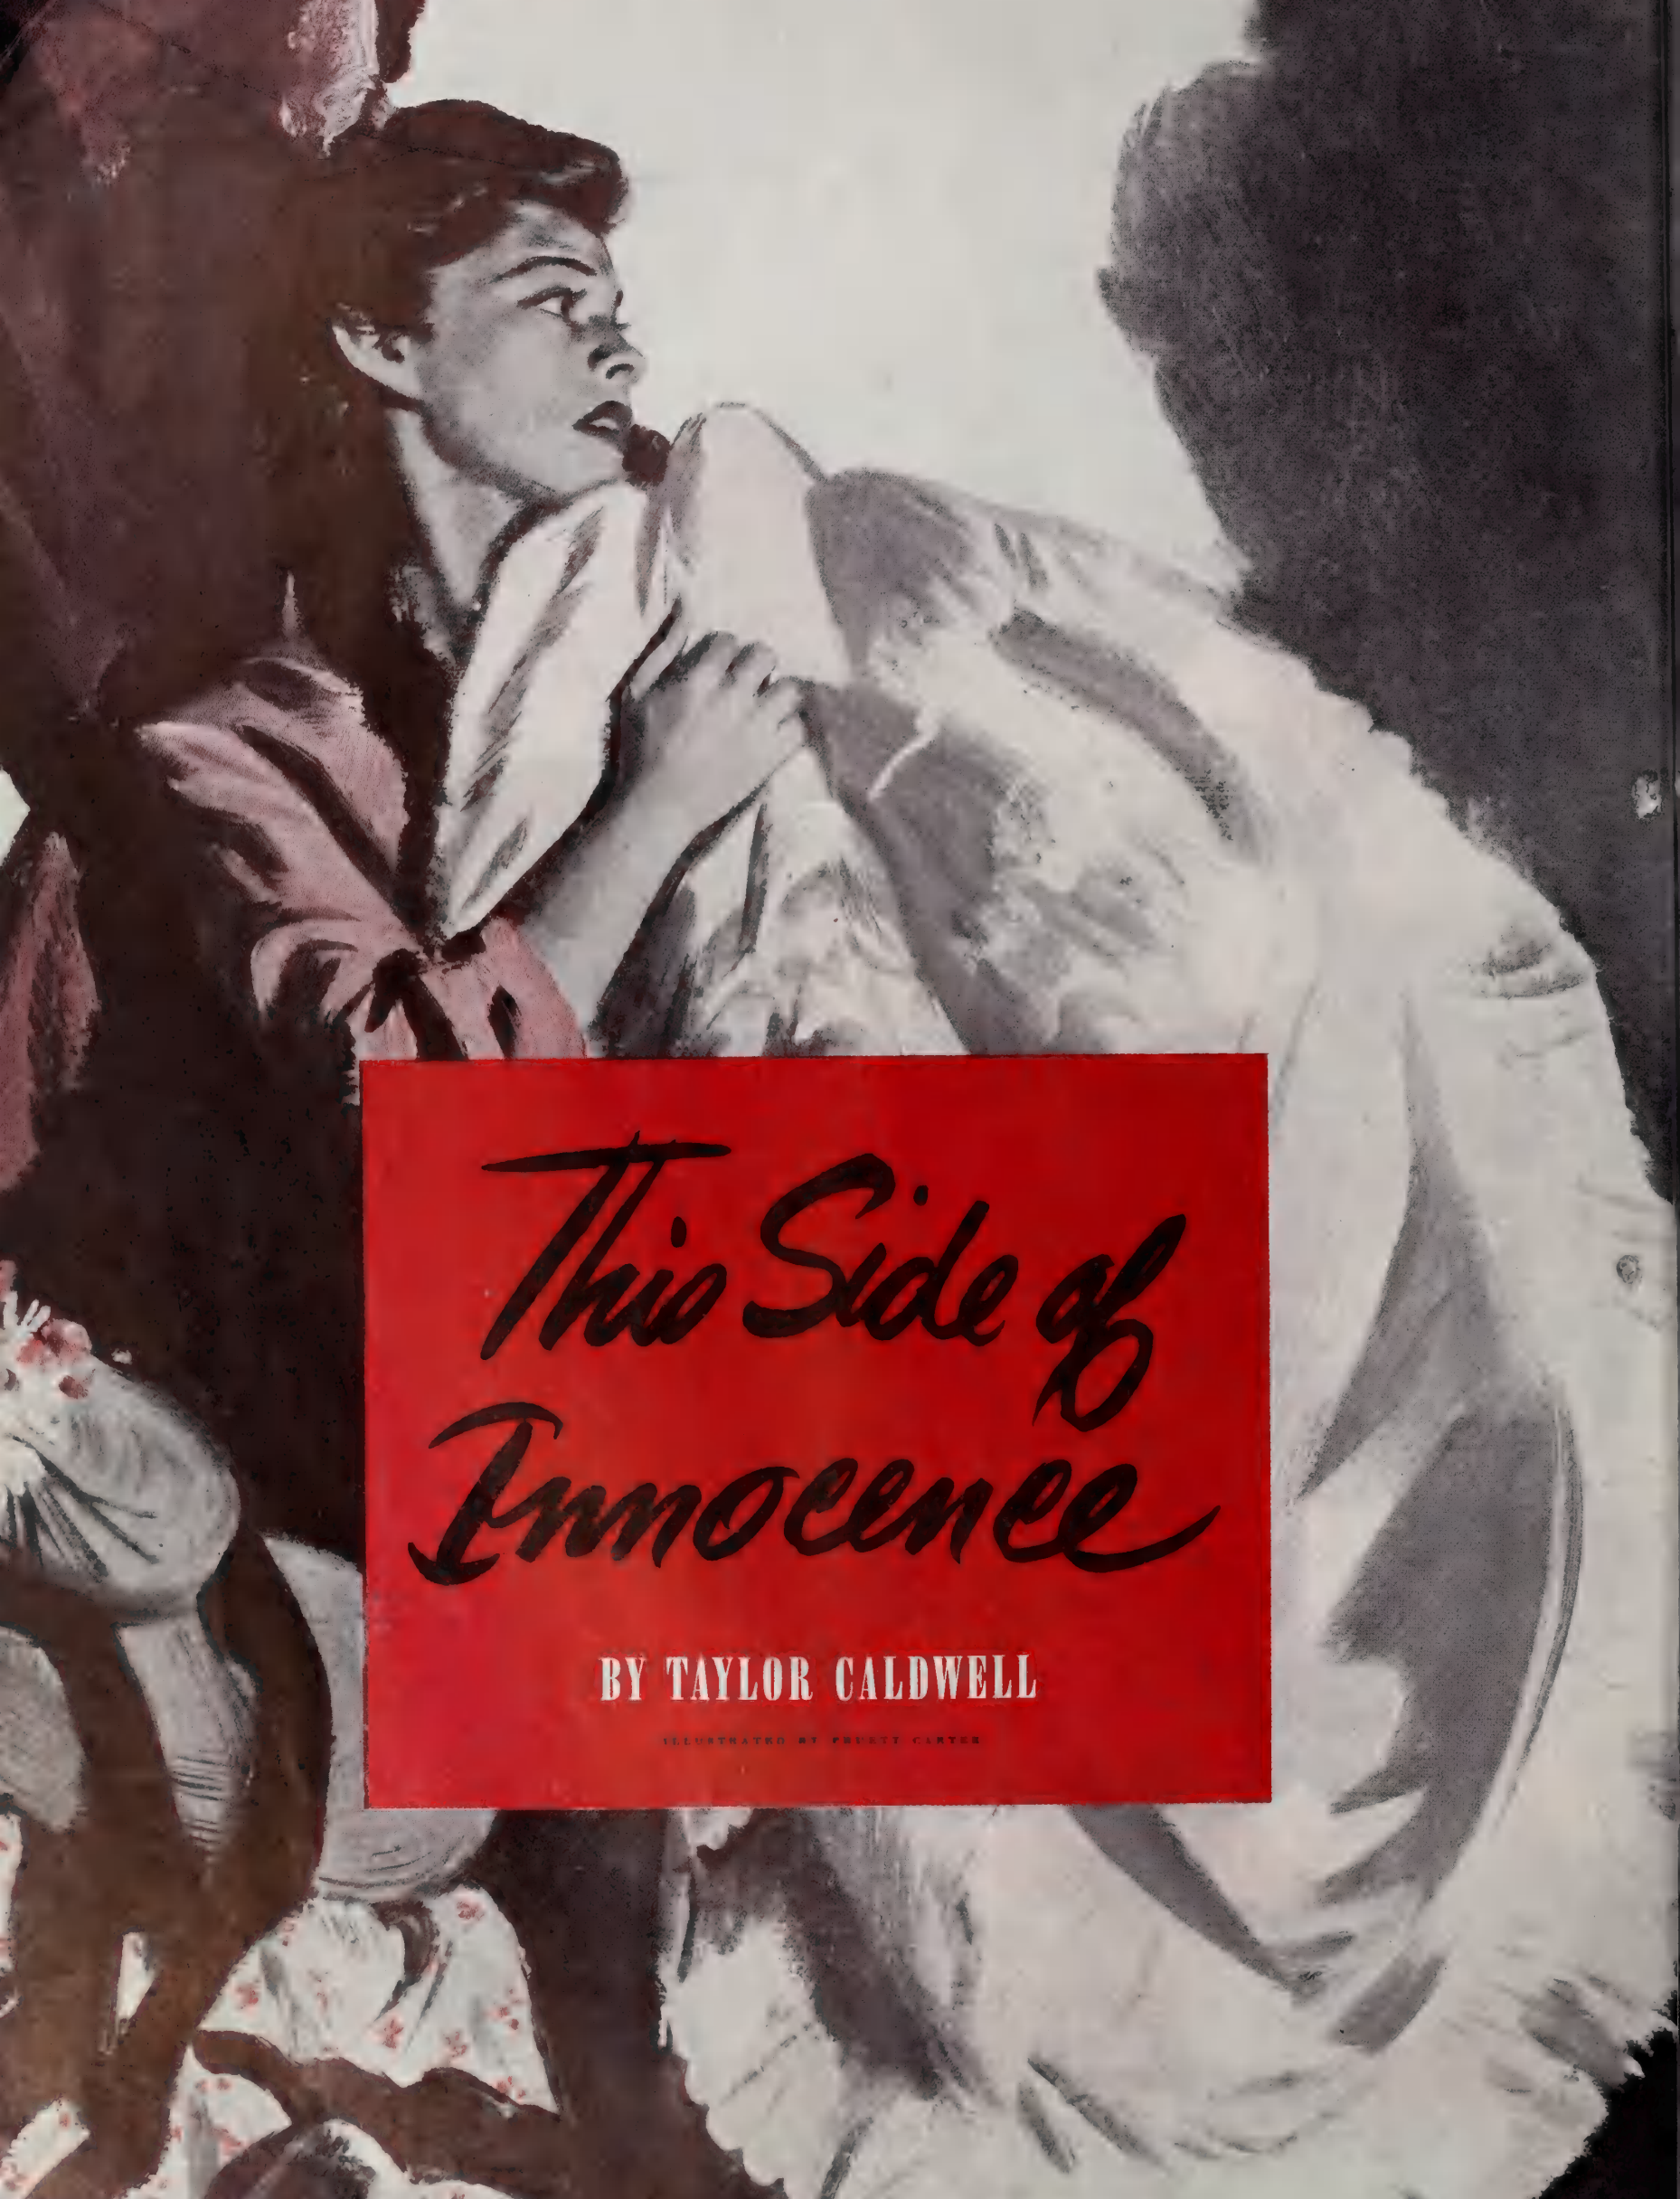
Architectural Editor of the Journal



THIS is a home for the Joneses. They have four children, from sixteen down to three; and with quite a few guests and a good deal of entertaining, the answer would seem to be an extra-big house. As things stand now, the Joneses could afford it. But families get smaller, and a big house becomes top-heavy. So their interesting solution is a two-house home. There is the little connected guesthouse for living and play, to serve as an overflow where older children can make themselves at home and there is always room for overnight or week-end visitors, of whom the Joneses have many. Then there is the larger house in which the life of the family centers. When in time the family gets smaller, there is always a choice of two houses to fit either one with the familiar atmosphere of home.

Let's say, for another situation, that the parents of two or three younger children have a newly married son or daughter who would like to live next door. For such an arrangement the setup suggested here would be ideal, as a look at the plan and picture will prove—the starting-out couple having a home whose rent and running cost would be in keeping with a beginning income. And for a situation somewhat in reverse, the smaller house would make an easily managed place for an elderly couple, with the larger house a good companion home for the family of their children.

For still another situation, a really good-sized family, of which several members might be wholly or partly self-supporting, could use both houses as a single home, sharing the cost and care, and coming together whenever they wished for meals and entertainment.



In any variation on these familiar themes, the beauty of this combination home would always be the friendly independence of the two co-operating establishments. Standing on adjacent lots, the two houses would be connected by an arbored walk and separated by a garden wall: the walk, one that could be disconnected at any time; the wall, one that could be high or low. Thus either home could be a source of income or revenue if it should ever be desirable for the family to occupy but one and rent or even sell the other. While the double garage shown here is one to be shared, there could of course be two garages instead.

You can easily imagine a whole community made up of combinations of this kind, where family ties could be preserved, and where families of different sizes and different incomes could live next door in a pleasant and practical fashion. You can also think of either house as a house to build by itself; and you can think of either as a house to be built at once out of pre-war materials, or soon out of the newer, simpler manufactured parts.

Put yourself in the place of the occupants, and by following the floor plans see how well the two-house idea lends itself to many types of living: one house expansive and complete, the other simple, compact, apartmentlike; yet both with equal livability.

This Side of Innocence

BY TAYLOR CALDWELL

ILLUSTRATED BY PRUETT CARTER

She had the air of a prisoner caught in the midst of despairing flight. Doctor Hawley said, "Alfred, may I talk to Amalie alone? It will only take a few moments."

PART THREE IN THE STORY OF THE WOMAN WHO MARRIED THE WRONG MAN

JEROME, dancing with Amalie at the party announcing her engagement to Alfred, asks her to run away with him. "A proposal without benefit of book?" she asks him, and he agrees that it is. Yet after Amalie's wedding to Alfred, Jerome is despondent and regrets that he did not stop the marriage. "I could have prevented it in some way."

Jerome, the Lindsey family black sheep and dilettante painter, has returned home to Hilltop because he thinks that his cousin Alfred's marriage to the vixenish Amalie will rob him of his own money. But much to everyone's surprise, Jerome settles down to work in his father's bank.

When Amalie returns from her honeymoon she cannot deny to herself a repulsion toward Alfred and an intense love for Jerome. Meanwhile, Jerome has become engaged to Sally Tayntor, daughter of Brigadier General Tayntor, who has given her a dowry of $100,000.

Alfred plans to take old Mr. Lindsey and young Philip, his son by a former marriage, away for a short rest at Saratoga, leaving Amalie at Hilltop with Dorothea, Jerome's sharp older sister. On the afternoon they leave, Dorothea goes for a short call and Amalie plans to rest. However, an electric storm comes up which terrifies Amalie. She runs from her room, sees Jerome, and falls into his arms, sobbing incoherently and crying out the most heartbreaking words of love.

III

THE storm raged without pause until sunset. By that time the rain began to slow, and at eight o'clock it stopped. Wheels grated only slightly on the wet gravel as Dorothea, in her carriage, looked up at the silent, unlighted house. She tried to reassure herself that Amalie was a strong and dauntless woman, but she remembered with some misgivings her father's remarks about Amalie's failing health. The storm had been fierce enough, indeed, to intimidate anyone.

Amalie's window was unlighted, but as the carriage rolled under Jerome's window Dorothea saw the golden bloom of a lamp. She alighted from the carriage, glanced up again at the window. And then she became rigid.

Quite distinctly she saw that Jerome was not alone, that the one with him was Amalie. They were held together in an embrace which even Dorothea recognized as passionate. She saw their faces merge; saw the gleam of Amalie's arms about Jerome's neck.

Dorothea heard a raucous sound, and it was some moments before she identified it as her own shocked breathing. She was shaking to her very bones. All at once she longed for her room, for her bed.

The front door was unlocked. She crept up the stairs in darkness. Once behind her closed door, she went to her bed and lay, her arms flung out on each side, her face like iron. Perhaps she fell into unconsciousness, for she was next aware that a wavering light was shining in her face. A servant was entering with a lighted candle.

"Oh, Miss Dorothea!" she exclaimed. "I did not know you were here. Mr. Jerome said you were probably staying the night in the village, but I thought I would turn down your bed in case ——"

Dorothea heard her own voice, calm and neutral: "I just returned, Nancy, and I am feeling very tired. May I have a cup of tea here in my room?"

"Oh, yes, ma'am! At once!" The girl went out hastily.

Dorothea pushed herself to her feet. She said aloud, "I must control myself. I must not give way!"

She washed her hands, threw cold water on her face, smoothed her hair. Then she sat before her unlighted hearth and shivered.

What was she to do? Should she go to Jerome and say, "I know what there is to know"? Should she go to Amalie and denounce her? Should she inform Alfred?

She knew, or thought she knew, Jerome. He was a blackguard and a villain without conscience or scruple. It was quite possible that he would laugh in her face. It was even possible that Jerome, knowing he had been discovered, might decide to run away with Amalie. What of the honor of the family? What of Mr. Lindsey? Would his health survive the shock of a shameful disclosure? No, she could not tell Jerome that she knew of his crime.

Could she denounce Amalie? What if Amalie went at once to Jerome and informed him of the denouncing? The same results would ensue as if Jerome had been told.

For a few moments Dorothea lost control of herself, and all her fierce hatred rose up like battering fists on the door of reason. Oh, the shameless creatures! How could they do this thing to Alfred? Dorothea was certain that the occasion had been planned. Jerome had gone to the village alone, so that he could return alone. Amalie had refused to accompany Dorothea, had waited for the return of her lover.

Dorothea sprang to her feet, hands clenched, eyes flaming. She ran to the door, was actually in the corridor before she came to her senses. When she did so she was trembling so that she had to grope her way back to her chair. She collapsed, covered her face with her hands, rocking back and forth in anguish.

What had she almost done? She had almost destroyed Alfred. She had most certainly almost destroyed her father. She had been on the verge of bringing even greater calamity to this house.

She stopped rocking and stared before her with parched eyes. Were the guilty to be free, never to be reproached? It seemed there was no solution. There was no solution but silence.

She said aloud, "I have only to watch them, and prevent them from ever doing this again."

Dorothea rose and went to her mirror and studied her blanched face. Yes, she looked ill. She would take to her bed. She would implore Amalie to sleep with her, declaring that she dared not be alone. Amalie could not refuse. Then, at the very thought of sharing her virgin bed with that vile creature, Dorothea turned violently sick.

But Dorothea did not have iron in her soul for nothing. It took her only a few minutes to master her sickness. It was for Alfred, she told herself with cold despair. She rang for a maid and asked that Amalie be sent to her.

DOROTHEA was compelled to draw heavily on her reserves of strength and determination during the next two weeks. She must never leave Amalie "unguarded." But she must not make this obvious. She was naturally robust of constitution, and she must pretend to be afflicted by vapors sufficiently disabling to demand Amalie's presence at night.

She was merciless in her constant demands. It meant nothing to her that Amalie became more quiet, more stern-lipped and ghostlike as the days passed.

The family physician assured Amalie that Miss Dorothea was suffering from certain delicate nervous and physical symptoms common to women of her age, and Dorothea took full advantage of this diagnosis. So Amalie could not be puzzled by Dorothea's bitter silences, her hard words, her criticisms. Amalie endured it all with abstracted courtesy. Perhaps her own desperate state of misery made her overlook intemperately vicious remarks. She did her work in a removed and mechanical state that suggested the actions of a sleepwalker.

Jerome never saw her alone for an instant. But he did see her bemused, white face and hear her voice at the dinner table. She did not turn her eyes his way; he had no method of communication in Dorothea's constant presence.

A gloom, reminiscent of the dark days of February when Mr. Lindsey had been ill, fell over the house. Finally Jerome could stand it no longer. He wrote a note to Amalie, sealed it, gave it to Jim.

"It is a matter of some importance," he informed the little cockney. "And it is necessary that Miss Dorothea be unaware of it."

Jim's gnomelike features darkened apprehensively.

Shortly before luncheon, Amalie came downstairs to arrange flowers for the table, and here Jim found her. He approached hastily, whispered, "I was to give you this, ma'am." He pressed the note into Amalie's hand and fled, for Dorothea was in the hall. The door swung to behind him.

Amalie had hardly time to thrust the note into the bosom of her dress before Dorothea entered. "Was someone just here?" she demanded.

The TRANSFORMATION

TWO MEN, EACH LACKING WHAT THE OTHER HAD, WANTED HER ★ BY BERYL MARKHAM

NO one had much to say about John Craig at first. People waited for him to reveal himself, and when he did—a few words at a time—they said that he was smug, even arrogant. Perhaps they meant self-sufficient and proud. He was both of these and a little more.

I first saw him at a gunsmith's shop in Nairobi. He was a huge man, young—twenty-six, perhaps—and he knew nothing of guns, nor did he want to. He was new to Kenya, but not to farming, and he had bought a tract of uncleared land up near the Mau forest, where leopards had of course begun to prey upon his livestock. He needed a rifle, he explained to the clerk; and as he examined three or four, I saw that he handled them without respect or appreciation. His hands were strong and insensitive, and he would jerk open the breech of a finely made weapon as if it were a rusted piece of machinery. In the end he chose a light Springfield of excellent design and walked away holding it as if it were an ax.

The clerk shook his head and looked at me. "He'll prop windows open with it," he said, "and let the barrel rust."

"I suppose so," I said. I didn't care whether or not he split wood with it, but I remembered the way he used his hands.

It proved to be the way he used everything. As we learned more of him we saw that his mind was as harsh as his touch. He was not cruel, but there was no sentiment in him that one could see, nor much curiosity except about material things that he could turn to his needs. What he did not understand he shrugged away. But he worked wonders with what he knew.

In very little time he cleared a hundred acres of his farm, blasting the stumps of massive trees, dragging boulders with teams of oxen, and finally gouging the soil in precise and parallel furrows—for he did not seem to plow the land, but to harass it with a kind of anxious fury until it bore. He had no talent for the earth and pretended none, but he knew it chemically and made it yield.

His house was built in a matter of weeks. It stood high and alone on the rim of the Rongai Valley—a dark intrusion on the gentle sky line. It was clean and square and bleak. Nothing could get into it that he did not want to get in, and among those things was cheer as other people knew it. Still, as a house, it was beyond criticism. It was solid, tight—a flawless shelter—and when the last nail had been sunk into its cedar planking, John Craig decided to marry.

IT was not an extraordinary decision except that it was so deliberately made and that, to the surprise of everyone, he set his mind on the one girl who was almost beyond his reach and certainly beyond his understanding. She was Anne Barton, whom Craig had met not more than twice, and who was in any case in love with another man—Larry Abbot, an independent pilot, the possessor of countless friends, but with not a shilling to his name.

Everyone knew about Anne and Larry; they seemed almost of a single identity, though for all of that it was a strange relationship. For three years their eventual marriage had been taken for granted, but it remained "eventual"; it never happened, simply because Larry remained too improvident to make it happen. Yet he and Anne were inseparable, and his adoration of her must have been as plain to John Craig as it was to everyone; but it had no effect on him. He was ready to marry and Anne Barton was the girl he wanted.

He went to Anne and made his fantastic proposal with such bluntness as can come only from a man of massive ego—and he was turned away with more grace, but with equal bluntness.

Anne Barton was essentially feminine, essentially gentle, and she had more wisdom at twenty-two, I think, than is commonly combined with beauty. She was a slender girl with chestnut hair that shone above deep eyes with a curious light in them. Perhaps they were sad eyes—they were at least musing—but she had a wealth of laughter nonetheless—laughter hoarded, as it were, against the moment and the friend. She lived alone in Nairobi, working as a secretary in order to live, but for the love of it she worked at being a sculptress; and while she had never had formal training in this, her hands could and did communicate to clay the strange intensity that was always in her eyes.

Of course she turned John Craig away, but not with anger or out of any affectation of outraged pride. She told him that he ought to see more of women—of other women.

"It's not enough just to be a man," she said, "even a strong and competent man. Women are not beggars, John. They don't have to take what's offered them. They choose, and the qualities they want are not what you think them to be. It's strange you haven't learned that. But one day you will."

He went away then, a giant of a man stung deeply, yet proud and unbelieving because he could not believe in anything except himself—and I cannot say that he ever changed in that. And yet because of what happened a little later during his inevitable quarrel with Larry Abbot, I am not sure, nor will I ever be.

I was myself a free-lance pilot in those days, and since Larry had taught me much of what I knew about flying, we saw each other almost daily at the Nairobi airport. His passion for the work was so intense that he had no room in his head or heart for the business of it. He made a living with his two planes, but it was a bare living when in East Africa at that time he might have made a small fortune. He was a slender man—about twenty-four then—with nothing arresting about him except searching gray eyes, fine hands and a smile that he seemed to reserve for small tragedy. Everything held a meaning for him, and he would spend hours in his plane, alone and often by night because, as he once said, he was fascinated by "the furnishings of darkness."

All in all, he was as different from John Craig as a plane is different from a plow; and it was this difference, among other things, that made it seem inevitable that he and Anne must one day marry. And yet, though he was deeply in love with her, he was equally in love with solitude, and Anne was afraid of that. Very often he would slide into the cockpit of his plane, wave a hand and take off, to be gone for days on profitless flight. He would fly into Tanganyika, or Abyssinia, or perhaps into the Belgian Congo, and when he came back, strangely refreshed, he would go to Anne, finding her in her tiny studio of half-born figures of clay, and they would talk for hours and laugh together—and make dreams that never came true. He offered her everything of the spirit, and she returned in kind and seemed happy. Yet, being a woman, she could want fulfillment of a kind he did not understand, and his repeated plea for marriage was turned back again and again because she believed that he thought of it too lightly—not as the profound and deep responsibility she wanted it to be. This was a constant hurt to him, so it was natural that when word of Craig's heavy-handed proposal to Anne reached Larry's ears, he was shocked and angered—shocked by what seemed to him the boorishness of it, and angered because it had never occurred to him that, marriage or not, Anne was not wholly his own.

"CRAIG may not know any better," Larry said to me, "but it's no excuse! How can you go to a woman you scarcely know and say, 'Look, I've got a farm and a new house and some cows, and now I want you for a wife'? What kind of man will do that?"

We were standing by the hangar at the airport, waiting for the low clouds to rise from the runway. Larry's rusty hair was tangled by the antics of a feeble morning breeze, his flying clothes—shirt, slacks and sneakers—were crumpled, but somehow neat. He swung his goggles from his forefinger in a little nervous arc.

"What kind of man?" he demanded again.

I didn't answer at once. I knew what kind of man, but I also knew about Larry—about his gentle irresponsibility, the ease with which he could detach himself from practical matters. It seemed to me that he was half a man, the sensitive, generous and forever-undecided half, while John Craig was the other half—muscle, mind and ego. Neither man was complete. Each, I thought, lacked the virtues of the other, and because of that their mutual contempt must in the end congeal into hard constructive hatred, though at that time they barely knew each other by sight.

"John Craig is not a subtle man," I said. "But he meant no insult to Anne. He just doesn't understand gentleness or tact."

"Or much else," said Larry, "except his farm and his boorish vanity. What he can't bend, he wants to break. But there are ways of curing that."

He shrugged then, and went into the hangar, and I went toward my own plane, which was already on the runway.

My father's farm and John Craig's were neighboring, and I would fly up from Nairobi on week ends or when the business of transporting mail and hunters into the hinterland slacked off a bit. On those occasions I would sometimes see John working in his fields or (Continued on Page 63)

BEGONIA HOBBY WINDOW

IF you want a plant that will make a collector of you before you know it, just start off with a few kinds of begonias on a window sill. They may sound old-fashioned and familiar, but no one knows them all, and hardly anyone realizes how various they are. Of all the plants you can keep under your thumb the whole year round, and keep a window constantly colorful and exotic, and probably end with a little assortment that no one else has ever matched, there is nothing to equal this extraordinary family.

When you mention begonias, some people see a spectacular Christmas plant completely covered with pink petals, like icing on a cake. Some see the luscious waxy flowers of the tuberous types, which seem to run right through the rainbow. Some remember the glossy dark round leaves of an easygoing plant on the window sill back home, and the way it would suddenly send up a spray of blossoms like a bursting rocket. Some think of prim little ever-blooming plants—red, white and pink—in beds and pots, with leaves from polished pale green to queer dark rose. And some think of the kinds called rex, which in many ways are the most remarkable of all, with crinkled leaves that are ribbed and splotched by strange and unexpected colors.

You want a window that is sunny in winter and shady in summer, and a room with a certain amount of moisture in the air. And if you are starting from scratch, you can safely begin with any you see in the picture below, which are fairly easy to get as small potted plants at a greenhouse. In the photograph are the well-known little semperflorens, almost always in bloom; the popular Coralline de Lucerna and haageana; the palm-leaved ricinfolia, and various hybrids of rex in the foreground.

If You Ask Me

BY ELEANOR ROOSEVELT

We civilians worked in different ways during the war. Please tell us what we can do for the peace. Surely we can have county, state and national federated organizations for peace that would be effective. Please be definite.

We can join with the organizations which are working in our localities for peace. I think perhaps the most effective thing we can do is to get together all the groups in our neighborhood and see how we can live together with good will at home, and then apply that good will to whatever position we take, or our country takes, toward the rest of the world.

Our most effective aid to peace is our citizenship at home and the way in which we choose our representatives, the way in which we watch their actions where international questions are involved.

There are many national organizations working for peace: the United Nations Organization, the Women's Action Committee and several others.

Although I am only sixteen years of age, I would like your answer to this question, as someone very dear to me has entered the service. Why hasn't the "duration of the war" been proclaimed by the President? I'm asking this in the case where someone enlisted before the war was over in the Army Air Corps and didn't get called until he was eighteen. On the orders it says he stays in only six months after the duration.

I imagine the President will not proclaim the end of the war until actual peace treaties are signed, and a United Nations Organization is set up.

The end of hostilities is never the end of a war, and the President may feel that it is necessary to keep on with certain powers which can be exercised only during the period of war.

Several people have told me that, from the very time your five children were born, you had help and never bathed one of them yourself or fed them or put them to bed, or even pinned a diaper. I do not believe this, as I don't think there is a mother, no matter how much help she has, who would not want the pleasure of doing some of these things. If you will answer this question, then that story will be settled for good.

I did have help from the time my children were born.

However, every mother, I think, at times takes complete charge of her children, and I was no different from any other mother. Every mother, for the reason you give, would miss a great part of the joy of motherhood if she did not bathe and dress and feed her own children. I did all these things every day of my life when my children were growing up, and I became a good trained nurse in the course of the years and nursed my family through various contagious diseases and serious illnesses.

How soon will it be before civilians will be able to travel in Europe—Italy and France—as tourists?

I do not think anyone can tell you that positively, but I should imagine it would be some time off, and certainly not until the armies of occupation are brought home. I can not imagine, however, that traveling as a tourist will be pleasant even after that. The destruction of beautiful buildings which some of us have known and loved in the past will make being a tourist a sorry business; and if we are conscious of the destruction which must have gone on among the people, I think most of us will prefer to stay at home unless we can be useful to the countries we visit.

Do you make new-year resolutions? If so, do you keep them?

I haven't made many new-year resolutions in my life. Those I have made, I have kept.

CARTOON BY BEN ROTH. REPRINTED COURTESY OF COLLIER'S.

"I let him kiss me once, and he's been trying to scrape up an acquaintance with me ever since."

I would like to know your views on necking, petting, and so on, for teenagers—or anyone, for that matter. Also late hours and good-night kisses. There have been many opinions expressed on this subject, but they all seem to beat around the bush so you don't know any more than when they started.

You must remember that I am sixty-one years old and therefore "necking" and "petting" have very little charm for me! That holds good for good-night kisses! Seriously, however, I think a girl is wise if she does not make herself cheap. I know that it is ordinarily said that unless a girl allows a young man to kiss her or lets herself be handled with familiarity, dates are apt to be few and far between. I have always doubted that, because I have always thought a really nice young man would understand quite well that until a girl was really attracted to him, she did not care to be mauled, and that she could be just as good fun and just as informal and friendly without the type of demonstration which sometimes leads one into more than one had counted on.

I think, also, you have to remember that someday you are going to meet someone you care for a great deal, and then you may be sorry that you have given other people so much of what you would like to have kept for a really great love.

Your granddaughter, Miss Dall, is quite a young lady now. Are you contemplating encouraging her mother to have young Negro men present at her debut or any other of her grown-up parties?

I have never contemplated interfering with what my children or my grandchildren do. I would neither encourage nor discourage any plans which they had for social recreation, nor interfere in any way in which they wished to conduct their lives. Once your children are grown up and have children of their own, the problems are theirs, and the less the older generation interferes, the better. I should hope, however, that like any other mature person, my granddaughter would know men and women of all races and appreciate them for what they are worth.

How in the world can you be so nice and polite to these nasty people that ask you personal questions like the one in the October issue who thinks it's unfair for you to have a widow's pension?

Why shouldn't I be nice? If people really want information, they are entitled to have it within certain limits, and if they are just trying to be disagreeable they are hurting themselves and not me.

Do you think that labor unions should have the right to participate in determining what industrial prices and profits should be?

I think we are coming probably to a period where our old ideas are going to change somewhat. There was a time when we thought it was nobody's business but the individuals' how much they worked, or under what conditions they worked, or how much profit an employer made, or what was charged to the consumer for the goods that were on the market. As we have developed, we think it is within our rights to know under what conditions any work is performed, and whether the wages paid make it possible for a family to maintain a decent standard of living. If we are interested in that, it goes without saying that we are interested in finding out whether a business can really pay these wages. We can only do that as we know what the recompense of management is, what the profits are to management and to the stockholders, what the remuneration is for distribution and whether the ultimate price to the consumer is a fair one or too much of a mark-up.

It should not be just labor unions and management who are interested in these questions. It should be the public as a whole, and the information should be available to any citizen. In fact, it seems to me quite fair that reports should be given on negotiations of contracts between labor and management, since all these points should come up for consideration, and those who are going to buy should be as interested as the people who are to perform the work and the people who own the business and are going to profit by what is sold.

Do you think there should be compulsory courses for girls in community work to correspond to a year's military training for boys?

I think girls should have exactly the same opportunities that are given to boys. The only variation is that they should do the kind of work which they are best suited to do, but as far as possible should have opportunities for education in citizenship responsibility. I think that the girl has just as much responsibility in the life of a community and of the nation and of the world, and therefore should have the same opportunities for training and preparation.

Is it true that you and the late President were cousins? Do you think there is any danger in cousins marrying cousins?

Yes, we were fifth cousins, once removed. I have been told that when the relationship is close it is not wise to marry; but we were so distantly related that we might not have known of the relationship if our families had not been friends and our names the same.

So everybody likes the smörgåsbord idea, eh? Well, here we've laid out (with the help of an oversize lazy Susan) a miniature version, complete with pickled herring, hot fish balls, salad, aspic, smoked salmon and cheese.

Now there are parties when about all that is required of you is the making of a variety of sandwiches of various shapes and kinds. For that kind of party, I have an idea that saves a lot of work and gives other people something to talk about.

When is a cake not a cake? When it's a sandwich cake. This means making something that looks like what it isn't. All dressed up with this and that. Frosted? Not at all, except frosting that is the thing that, as our old cook used to say, is "all to taste and nothing for hopin'." For this frosting is a cream-cheese "fixin'," and you'll be surprised; only don't file it under frostings—just put it down under what goes with what. Finishing touches, that's the idea. And now let us get on with the works.

THE "CAKE BUSINESS"

Make up a couple (or double) of my well-known (I hope) roll receipts. How many times I have told you of them. I've found none better, nor ever expect to. Instead of making into rolls, bake in nine-inch layer-cake pans. Or you may prefer a long cake instead of a round one. In which case bake in long loaf pans. It's a cake you are making and not a batch of rolls. That is all. You can, of course, buy baker's bread, round or long.

Fillings are the Next Steps

Here is Number One: To 4 cups of ground cooked smoked tongue, add 2 tablespoons of prepared mustard, 1 small onion, grated, 1½ tablespoons of horse-radish, 1 cup of mayonnaise. It won't need much salt, but can stand considerable pepper.

Number Two: To 1 five-ounce jar of sharp spreading cheese add 1 cup of finely chopped toasted or salted almonds. Have your cheese warm and it will spread away like anything.

Number Three: Peel half of a ripe avocado. Put through a sieve. Add ½ cup of chopped hard-cooked egg, 1 grated onion, ¼ teaspoon of curry, 1 tablespoon of mayonnaise and salt and pepper to taste.

Number Four: To ¼ pound of cream cheese add 3 slices of crisp bacon, crumbled, and 2 tablespoons of chopped parsley. Add cream enough to soften. Season with Worcestershire sauce, salt, pepper.

Now to get down to business. Have ready some softened butter or margarine for spreading, and cut your bread into six

Nine a Day

1 That Pilgrims weren't Puritans is made as plain as the difference between a beard and burnsides, in SAINTS AND STRANGERS, by George J. Willison. Do not be deceived about goings on in Colonial America. Read this book. Mark it and inwardly digest it. Then read it again.

2 Add a little ground ginger to the sirup when you make candied orange or grapefruit peel. That's a hint. You know what to do with it.

3 Now that corned beef raises its old-time bonnet again, it doesn't have to be hash. Slice it, grill it with mustard sauce and bring it on with creamed potatoes. Or with scrambled eggs for supper.

4 Does corned beef bring up memories of ham? Does to me. Heat some slices of cold boiled ham to serve with a cheese soufflé and a pineapple-and-cream-cheese salad. Good enough for a party for a duchess or for Mrs. Jones.

5 For supper Sunday or secular (vocabulary on the up and up): Small toast slices in a shallow baking dish. Sautéed mushrooms next and poached eggs on top. Cheese sauce a-swimmin' about, browned under the broiler. Why, it's a receipt I'm telling you.

6 Poached dates, well pitted (poached in vanilla sirup, you know), served with chilled custard is a chi-chi dessert and likely to be admired by all.

7 Keep your fruitcake or cookies in their pristine elegance of moistness by putting a piece of raw apple in the cake box. Change it sometimes as you would your breastpin. Or other things.

8 Pitless but not pitiless are the garlic olives. Then there are olives bottled with curry, too, and dill. They're welcome surprises at any party.

9 Chickens deserve distinguished treatment after some of the snubs they've stood for. Well, a stuffing of seasoned boiled rice with finely minced onions and sliced truffles does it. Fry the stuffing in butter or margarine first.

10 On the subject and in the groove, as they say. Wrap your chickens in heavy parchment paper and roast till well done. Unwrap and brown at the last—but only to the color of pale topaz. (It's topaz I mean, if topaz is the color I think it is.)

11 Second chapter on above: Take the chickens from the pan. Add a tablespoon or two of butter or margarine and a can of truffles, sliced. Also add two cups of small oysters. Mix with the juices in the pan some of the oyster liquor, the juice of half a lemon, heavy cream to thicken, and when boiling, pour over the chickens.

12 Now it can be told, Beacon Hill division: Breakfast in 1858: stewed pigeons with baked mushrooms, deviled gizzard, venison pasties, liver pudding, pork, cheese, flannel cakes, buckwheat cakes and fish balls. Men must eat and women must weep. Those that survived.

13 Season about three dozen clams and scallop with a rich cream sauce. Add a little lemon juice. Don't forget the onion, cut fine. Let there be pepper too. Bake and brownish let it be, set it down not too far from me.

14 Thick slices of pineapple, fresh or canned, are a fine thing to bake with a slice of ham. Oh, you knew ham and pineapple are in again, didn't you? Sure they are. Aud it's high time we began to brush up on some of those old favorite receipts.

15 Creamed oysters in little puff-paste shells are very pleasant eating at a New Year's party. And you needn't wait until next New Year's either.

16 News and not so newsy: They say they have put those fabulous crepes Suzette in jars and cans. Just heat and eat. Life can be so colorful, can't it?

CURRIER & IVES

17 You probably know what a "brace" of game is. Perhaps there's a hunter of renown come to town. But there's also a game farm, and they'll send you a brace of pheasants, for instance. Currant jelly too. Also receipts.

18 Crusty topping for gingerbread: Cream 3 tablespoons confectioner's sugar with 1 tablespoon butter. Add 2 tablespoons grated orange rind and ½ cup chopped nuts. Spread on gingerbread before baking.

19 If you must have a carrot in your cuisine, try a can of chicken, peas and carrots. Late-for-dinner number.

WINTER PICTURE

Will you come where the snowflowers hide
Under the winter green?
Now is the snow's low tide,
The silent hidden scene.

Who will gaze on the burdened tree,
Touch the uncovered nest?
See what the thorn berries see
In their fretful rest?

See the white breakers ride
At the snow's low tide.

20 From an old cookbook: "This soup (mock-mock turtle) makes the eater wish his throat a mile long and every inch of it palate." And even I have been accused of extravagant language!

21 Little rice muffins, scooped out hot and filled with jam, are a delicate deliciousness that belongs on the tea table. A variety of jams fits all appetites.

22 Take some of those golden pippins, as golden as the heart of an alderman just before election—maybe not as yellow—but anyway, bake until tender. Cover with flavored meringue stuck with sliced nuts and bake in a most reluctant oven until light brown. Serve with cream.

23 For my doubloon give me crisp lettuce, orange slices and alligator pear for a salad. Dressy, but not fussy. (French dressing made with lemon.)

24 Excuse it, please. Who invented fish balls, and where's his or her monument? Go ahead and make up a batch—part with canned salmon, part with codfish. Size of a big marble, fried in deep fat, and there's something "hors d'oeuvrey" enough for anybody. Stick one of each on a toothpick. Line forms on the right.

25 Broiled stuffed chicken or turkey legs are, as they say, "something." Baste as you broil—but not all the time. There's a time to broil and a time to baste. And a time to refrain from basting.

26 Bridge luncheons are on the wax. (Were on the wane for a spell back there.) Heat two or three cans of concentrated cream of mushroom soup. Add a tablespoon of chopped chives. Add a cup of heavy cream. Salt and white pepper to taste. Fill individual casseroles, cover with herb-flavored buttered crumbs and brown. Garnish with sautéed green chopped peppers. Go to town with a green or tossed salad and hot hot rolls.

27 Cauliflower and almonds. So what? Cook the cauliflowers whole. Drain. Cover with a beaming red-hot cheese sauce. Shower with toasted almonds. The sometimes despised member of the cabbage family becomes the well-beloved.

28 Yams, boiled, sliced and candied, are twice the yams the yam addicts dream of when done with orange juice in the sugar. Brown? To be sure. Orange marmalade in place of both juice and sugar does the trick too.

29 Sliced sautéed mushrooms and finely cut fried sausage give wild rice that come-hither you've wondered about.

30 That canapé tray or what not should show as much variety as the apron table at a church fair. Remember the little pastry shells stuffed with grilled sausages.

31 I don't know why, but it just came to me that a patch is good only as long as it sticks. This has nothing to do with anything—and so Happy New Year!

Amalie pushed the last flower into its bowl. She said, "Did you expect to find someone?"

Dorothea stiffened, but before she could speak, Amalie was saying, in a gentler tone: "Forgive me. I am afraid I am somewhat nervous." The two women sat down to their silent meal. Amalie said, "It is so bright outside. Would it not be possible for us to go out for a short walk, or a ride?"

Dorothea grimly fished for her smelling salts. "I am afraid you have not understood Doctor Hawley, Amalie. Have you forgotten that he said I must rest constantly, no exertion, no disturbing—conditions?"

Amalie said, "No, I have not forgotten. But you seem quite strong, and the mild weather might do you good."

"I feel exceptionally weak today," said Dorothea. "I shall have to ask you to come to my room with me and go over the household accounts while I rest in bed."

You selfish, inconsiderate wretch! thought Amalie, following Dorothea to the latter's bedroom. All her listlessness was gone. It was as if Jerome's note, which lay in the hollow between her breasts, had given her renewed life. She helped Dorothea remove her boots, assisted her into bed. Then she announced that she would bring her knitting into the room for work after the accounts were finished. She ran to her own room, shut the door, locked it. Then she took out Jerome's note and read it.

It was brief: "Can you escape the gorgon today for a few minutes? Or in the evening? There is much to discuss." It bore neither salutation nor signature.

Amalie crushed the note in her hand. Her face had come alive, brilliant, tremulous. She opened a drawer in her bureau and hid the note deep under piles of garments. She took up her knitting bag and returned to Dorothea's room.

She seated herself tranquilly and discussed household accounts with Dorothea. Her voice was soothing and low, her needles clicked sleepily. Dorothea, who always napped briefly in the afternoon, let her eyelids fall. She fell away into an uneasy sleep.

Amalie rose and tiptoed from the room. Once safe in the hall, she ran to her own room, hastily threw a shawl over her shoulders, tied on a bonnet with fingers that shook absurdly. She caught up her reticule, fled down the stairway.

She let herself out through the back door. She ran to the barn. Two of the stableboys came toward her, pulling off their caps.

"I'd like the buggy, please," she said.

One of the boys hesitated. "You'll be driving alone, ma'am?"

"Yes." Amalie's breath came fast.

She winced as the buggy was driven from the barn. What a fearful clatter the wheels made! The boy helped Amalie climb into the seat. She gathered up the reins in her gloved hands and turned the horse onto the graveled driveway.

The wheels rolled with a gentle swaying motion. Now she had reached the road to the village, and the hill lay behind. She slapped the reins briskly on the horse's back, her heart pounding. The wheels skimmed and bounced on the road; the mare threw up her head, her mane flowing.

It was fortunate that the village streets were unusually deserted this warm afternoon. At the bank Amalie sprang out, tied the horse and walked swiftly up the long stairway. It was after banking hours. She put her hand on the door of Alfred's office and entered, closing the door behind her.

The office was empty. All at once Amalie's calm left her. How terribly indiscreet she had been! Terror and misery made her run swiftly toward the door of Jerome's office. She flung it open. Jerome was at the window. He heard her enter, turned and came to her.

"There was no other way," she said huskily. She felt the wretched blood in her cheeks.

He hesitated. Then he drew out a chair and said, "Sit down, Amalie. Jamison, or one of the clerks, may come in at any moment. We must settle things—now."

"Yes." Her lips formed the word soundlessly.

"We must go away. Before Alfred returns on Saturday. He will divorce you. We must leave tomorrow night."

She pushed back her bonnet with a distracted hand. "No. We cannot do that."

"May I ask, my dear, what you propose as an alternative?"

She tried to speak, swallowed thickly. "We must wait until Alfred returns. We cannot run away like criminals. We owe it to all of them to be honest, to make plans that have dignity and decency."

He smiled unpleasantly. "'Dignity—decency'? Do you imagine Alfred will sit down with us and discuss our ——"

She put up her hand in a wild and defensive gesture as if to avert a blow.

Jerome said with sudden gentleness, "My darling. You see how impossible it is."

She was silent. For now the enormity of the situation struck her as it had not before. She had come as a calamity to that house on the hill, disrupting the peace, mortally striking at a dying old gentleman, a crippled, loving boy, an honorable man. She had betrayed them all.

She said in a strained voice, "It would be best if I went away. Alone."

Jerome tapped the desk with slow fingers. "You mean, I should follow later?"

She shook her head. "No. I—I could leave a letter for Alfred ——" She could not continue. She put her kerchief to her mouth. Then she withdrew it and went on: "I could say I had decided to go away, and beg him not to try to find me. It would—hurt him, immeasurably. But it would not injure him as much as if ——"

He got up and came to her and took her cold hand. "My dear," he said, and for the first time there was emotion in his voice. "Do you think I wouldn't follow until I found you?"

Then it seemed to her that her heart broke. She pressed her face to the back of his hand, and tears burst from her eyes. She said, "Oh, Jerome, tell me you love me! Tell me you have not changed or I shall really die!"

Jerome took her face in his hands and kissed her. She put her arms about his neck and he felt their frenzied and clinging strength. He looked into her drenched eyes, so imploring, so vulnerable.

With lips moving against hers, he said, "My darling, my love." Her arms fell from his neck. He wiped away her tears with infinite tenderness. He said, "Let me take care of this, Amalie, my dearest. You must understand this is the only way, our leaving together at once."

She whispered, "Your life, Jerome. I have ruined it. The bank—you have made a place here. Now I have destroyed everything. And your father—it will kill him."

"I think not," he replied with more confidence than he felt. "After a little he will be glad that we are happy. And we are going to be happy, you know."

"But how could you be happy, forever cut off from your father? And Alfred ——" She was wringing her hands.

His brows drew together. "Do you think I care for that bigot, that stick? This will well repay him for years of stuffiness and righteousness!"

But she had become very still. "You are cruel," she said, staring at him motionlessly.

She was remembering the night when Alfred had told her of his loneliness. She had come perilously close to loving him then, in her compassion and in her sudden knowledge of his integrity and hidden desire for the affection of others.

Jerome was alarmed at Amalie's expression. He took a step toward her, but she moved away from him.

"You have always hated Alfred," she exclaimed. "You never understood him. You jeered at him; you attempted, always, to make him appear a fool. But you have never deceived others."

"Very clever," said Jerome softly. "So I have attacked a hero. And now you have the audacity to call me cruel. Don't you think the same epithet applies to you also?"

Her face had become pinched and gray. But she regarded him without wavering. "Yes," she said clearly. "We are both disgusting. It will be better for Alfred never to see either of us again."

He leaned against the desk and smiled. "That, my pet, is what I have been attempting to tell you." They looked at each other now without love or passion. "It is settled, then, that we must go away at once?"

She was twisting her bonnet strings in her tremulous hands. "No. We must first talk to Alfred. We must make him see that he is not suffering any loss in my going."

"And you intend to tell him as soon as he returns?"

The ribbons were tight and drawn over her fingers. "Yes. The proper occasion must present itself. It will."

He came close to her. "Well, let me tell you, my dear, everything is not in your hands. I have a few ideas of my own. You are not going to make a fool of me." He turned abruptly. "Perhaps you think it might be pleasant to deceive your noble husband on other occasions, with me as your compliant accomplice. Perhaps I have underestimated your cleverness, my pet."

Amalie did not stir. She only gazed at him with insensely purple eyes.

"Or," he continued with cold violence, "you would think it most obliging of me if I removed myself permanently and never returned to my father's house?"

He waited, but she did not speak.

Then he exclaimed, "Amalie! My darling! Forgive me. I know what I have been saying is not true."

The bonnet strings fell from her fingers. She put her hands over her face. He did not know what to do. He wanted to take her in his arms, but that seemed impossible just now.

"Why don't you trust my judgment?" he pleaded. "I am stronger than you, my dearest. See here—I have another plan. Why do you not go away, and stay with a friend of mine in New York? In the meantime I will talk to Alfred, and thereafter join you. You will be spared all—unpleasantness, and I assure you that I am quite capable of managing the situation alone."

She dropped her hands. Her cheeks were streaked with tears.

"Thank you, Jerome," she whispered. "But I cannot do that. I cannot run away like a thief. I owe this much to Alfred." She looked blindly about for her reticule. It was on the chair she had left. She picked it up, then turned to Jerome imploringly. "Please, please," she murmured. And flung out her hand.

He was silent while she, in turn, speechlessly pleaded with him. When she saw that he would not soften toward her, or understand, she went to the door and hurried through it.

Dr. Willis Hawley regarded Amalie with kindly and concerned worry. The physician was an elderly man with a brown face and curiously alive eyes the color of old amber. He was not only physician to the Lindseys but a family friend of many years' standing as well.

He said regretfully, "Well, now we know definitely. But there is plenty of time, Miss Amalie. You are still young. Twenty-three it is, isn't it? But there is a more serious matter than this disappointment, which is temporary, I hope. You are not well. I have noticed, on my visits to Miss Dorothea, that you have been failing, my child. It is not anemia, nor any organic trouble, I am certain. I know how devotedly you have cared for old William and Miss Dorothea. But I may tell you frankly that Miss Dorothea is in no danger. Middle-aged ladies are frequently petulant and demanding. You must not worry unduly about her. I might even suggest a little neglect of her, for your own good. The air, the sun, quiet walks and drives, simple meals, sleep—all these will restore your health. I have a tonic for you, but it will have no benefit unless you take better care of yourself."

He walked to the buggy with her. He must talk to Alfred, he reflected. The girl was extremely ill. He watched Amalie drive away, and returned to his house, shaking his head. Yes, he must have a talk with Alfred on his return.

Amalie allowed the horse to draw the buggy home without any direction on her part. Indeed, she was incapable of control. She found no consolation or hope anywhere.

I have no one to blame, not even Jerome, she thought. I knew, the first night I saw him, that we belonged to each other. He, at least, was honest enough to accept that. He asked me to go away with him before I married Alfred. I knew that I could make him marry me; a woman always knows that. But he had no money, no immediate prospects. So I am more guilty than he. I was a coward.

The buggy was climbing the slope now. Amalie lifted her aching eyes to Hilltop. She could not bring misery and shame to that house. She must go away. It was better for one to suffer than several. She had no illusions that Jerome would speak, after she had gone. She knew him too well. He was too selfish, too expedient, too unscrupulous. He was, moreover, a realist. She needed only this one embittered reflection to make her resolution firm.

She left the buggy at the stable. She discovered that a terrible weakness had come over her, and every step toward the house was an effort. She could hardly push open the heavy oaken door, and the mild exertion made her heart beat suffocatingly in her throat.

The hall was warm and dim as the door closed behind her, and silent. She began to climb, and every step was agony. She was already an exile, already an intruder.

The door of her room was closed. She pushed it open. Dorothea sat there, her arms folded across her grim breast. Amalie saw her mouth, its bitter hatred. She saw Dorothea's eyes, burning in her gray gaunt face.

"Where have you been?" said Dorothea.

Amalie made herself close the door behind her and advance toward the dresser. She put down the bottle which the doctor had given her. "I have been to see Doctor Hawley. He gave me this tonic."

Pneumonia fights a losing battle!  Since 1934, prompt medical care and new drugs have halved  deaths among pneumonia patients! But pneumonia is still dangerous, because some kinds defy penicillin and sulfa.  Although pneumonia usually attacks those weakened by fatigue,  unusual exposure, or grippe, it can also strike healthy  people!

Don't Give Pneumonia a Chance!

If you start to sniffle and sneeze, take care of yourself—for a severe or protracted cold is often the forerunner of pneumonia.

Drink plenty of fruit juices, milk, and water. Go to bed if possible. If the cold is a bad one, or hangs on more than a few days, consult your doctor.

Pneumonia's first warning is often a severe chill, followed by a fever. It may already have attacked if you have coughing accompanied by pain in the side or chest, rapid, labored breathing, or thick, rust-colored sputum.

If any of these symptoms appear, call a doctor at once! Go to bed and remain absolutely quiet!

Only your own physician can determine whether it is advisable to use serum, sulfa drugs, or penicillin in your case. Even then they should be used only under his direct supervision.

Unfortunately, certain infections such as virus pneumonia do not respond to such aids. In cases like these, prompt diagnosis and medical and nursing care are even more essential, and it will increase tremendously the probability of recovery without serious complications.

While medical science is helping to bring pneumonia down in the "cause-of-death" list, its prevention is still up to you! For further information about pneumonia, send for Metropolitan's free booklet, 16-J, "Respiratory Diseases."

Dorothea said, still very quietly, "Did you see—him? You sneaked away while I slept. You ran away—to see him. Shameless, abandoned woman. I have known about you two for a long time. I have tried to hide my knowledge—for Alfred's sake." Her voice broke now, cracked with savage pain. "You have made it impossible."

Amalie said softly, "I am going away—alone. Tomorrow. None of you need ever see me again."

Dorothea reached out and grasped her arm. "I cannot prevent your going. But—I can tell Alfred, and my father. Your lover will not dare remain here, for he will know that Alfred will kill him. Go, if you wish. Run away, hide. But you will be guilty of more than adultery. You will be guilty of murder."

"Your father," whispered Amalie.

Dorothea's face tightened malignantly. "My father." The grip on Amalie's arm had become agonizing. "Do you think I care for anybody but Alfred? I have never cared for anybody in all my life but Alfred. When he married that young fool who died, I thought there was nothing left for me to live for. When she was laid in her grave, I was happy. I knew that in time he would realize that we loved each other ——"

In spite of her terror, in spite of her growing faintness, Amalie was astounded. She felt Dorothea's breath in her face.

"And then," cried Dorothea, "you came! You disgusting creature! You seduced him into marriage. You took him from me, and now you think you can disgrace him forever. You betray him and laugh at him in secret. But you fail to reckon with me!"

Sheer terror gave Amalie the force to wrench her arm from Dorothea's grasp. She exclaimed, "I am going away. I will go now. But, for God's sake, don't hurt Alfred more than he has already been hurt. If you—you ever cared for Alfred, have pity on him. Don't tell him. Let him forget me."

"No!" Dorothea replied. "I will tell him everything!"

Amalie clutched the edge of the bureau with slipping hands. "You do not love him," she said. "You want to revenge yourself on him because he preferred other women to you."

Dorothea straightened. She lifted her hand and struck Amalie full in the face.

Amalie did not wince, did not cry out. She stood still, in absolute silence, and the whiteness of her cheek slowly reddened into the full fingerprints of Dorothea's hand. There was no fear, no terror in her eyes now. She said clearly, "You have called me shameless and disgusting. But you are more shameless and disgusting than I. It is you who would ruin Alfred and break his heart, not I. And only out of vengeance and hatred."

Dorothea lifted her hand again with a frantic gesture, as if she would strike Amalie down. But Amalie smiled contemptuously.

"Do not touch me again, Dorothea. If you do, you will be sorry." Her hand closed on a candlestick on the bureau behind her. "And now you will listen to me. I have told you I will go away. But I will stay here until Alfred returns, and until I have told him myself. I have more pity for him than you have, and I swear to you that if you denounce me before I have spoken to him, I will tell him of this scene and what you have told me! He will know everything, and he will reproach you for having been the cause of his misery and pain, for he will know that but for you his suffering would have been less." She caught her breath. "And now, please go out of my room. Leave me alone. I—I am ill, I think."

Still staring at her, Dorothea backed away slowly. She reached the door, fumbled for it blindly. Then she went out.

When Jerome returned from the bank he saw neither Amalie nor his sister. All the rooms were still and empty. He went up the staircase to his room.

Jim was waiting for him, very sober. Jim said, "The ladies won't be down to dinner, I'm told, sir. Miss Dorothea is indisposed, and Miss Amalie has a headache. Shall I bring up your tray, or will you go downstairs?"

"Bring up a tray, by all means," said Jerome. He added, "Bring up one for yourself too, Jim. We'll eat together."

Mr. William Lindsey had always been certain, with Confucius, that good manners solved all sorts of difficulties. Jerome, strolling over Hilltop's grounds that evening, speculated on the uses of good manners in his present predicament. Good manners demanded a basis of good taste. Jerome could only assure himself that in so far as good taste was concerned, he possessed none.

He stood on the slope below Hilltop, in the grove of pines. And it came to him that in his abandonment of good taste he had, for the first time, known what it was to live. Bad taste had forced the drawers of Alfred's secret files, and had brought Jerome, for the first time, into contact with the lives and the miseries and the frustrations of others. Bad taste had entangled him with the wife of his cousin, his adopted brother. But this entanglement had brought him the first deep passion of his life, his first physical and mental and emotional fulfillment. There was definitely something wrong with the exercise of good taste.

> Whenever you are angry, be assured that it is not only a present evil, but that you have increased a habit.
> —EPICTETUS.

Five months ago, he reflected, he could have withdrawn himself without much difficulty. A woman unknown could be sentimentalized about and deserted with only a touch of sweet melancholy. But a woman intimately known, understood, became part of a man's flesh and blood, and he could no more abandon her than he could voluntarily abandon himself. Even if he willed it consciously, he could not really leave Amalie.

Nor could he leave the bank. With profound amazement, he understood now that for some inexplicable reason he was bound up with the bank and its problems. He did not quite comprehend, as yet, why he was so concerned with the affairs of Riversend, and he had a secret conviction that part of his concern lay in his detestation of the smug and iron-willed Alfred. However, he found that power to control and order the affairs of others, especially those others who were at the mercy of Alfred Lindsey, was unexpectedly sweet.

He could not leave his father now, either. Nor his home. When the family returned, there would have to be an open consultation. Certain facts might have to be suppressed, for the sake of decency and future harmony. But Jerome did not doubt that he could present the problem with dignity and reason. Certainly there would be a stinking uproar, but he and Amalie had only to stand their ground quietly and openly.

He got to his feet and went back to the house. There was no sign of his sister or Amalie. Someone had lit a lamp or two in the library. He rang a bell, sent for Jim. The little man came quickly.

"Jim," said Jerome, "I want you to go to Mrs. Lindsey's room and ask her to come downstairs to me here."

"But the lady 'as retired, sir."

"Unretire her, then," said Jerome. "Go on, be off with you, Jim."

Jerome walked up and down the library. He felt a quite pleasant and exciting strength, an exhilaration. He had discovered that it can be an agreeable and exciting thing, to make hard decisions.

He heard a slight sound and looked up, to see Amalie on the threshold. She was very white and still, in her gray cotton frock with the cream-colored collar and cuffs. Her eyes were heavily shadowed, her lips without color.

"Bro-ther, it must rain milk back here!"

It's midnight, and the huge troopship has just eased into harbor. Beside the gang-plank, a swing band plays. Spotlights pick out banners; crowds pack the pier railings. And right up front with the "welcome committee" are truckloads of milk.

Hardly does a soldier thump his barracks bag down on the dock before he dives for an ice-cold carton of milk. When a whole division lands at once, it takes about 35,000 half-pint containers to satisfy their thirst!

These men have a hefty craving for fresh milk to "catch up with." That's why it flows so freely at home-coming receptions, at processing centers, and at hospitals, too, where one recreation worker claims it outranks blondes in popularity!

Out of service, it's more than likely this army-fostered appetite for milk, ice cream and other dairy products will carry into civilian life. A good point to remember, for the cook who takes over from Uncle Sam.

And while you fill your ex-fighter's order for these favorite foods, National Dairy continues its effort to safeguard their purity and improve their quality. Our laboratories — incubator of many important wartime developments — continue to find new ways in which milk — "nature's most nearly perfect food"— can contribute to the nation's health.

Dedicated to the wider use and better understanding of dairy products as human food . . . as a base for the development of new products and materials . . . as a source of health and enduring progress on the farms and in the towns and cities of America.

Jerome said gently, "Come in, Amalie. I must talk to you."

He did not move toward her, as she came into the room and sat down. He sat near her, and smiled.

"My dear," he said, "I have been thinking. You were quite right; we cannot run away like criminals. When Alfred and my father return, we will tell them of our feeling for each other, and demand your release. Alfred cannot refuse; my father, I know, will help me. It will be very disagreeable for a while, but in the end things will resolve themselves, with dignity, if only we have the firm conviction and the courage."

She whispered, "Jerome." She tried to smile, and he found the effort almost unbearably touching.

He exclaimed, with a sudden quickening, "My darling, do you realize how much I love you? What at first was infatuation is now something much more steadfast, for I know now how much integrity you possess, and how much honor and courage and pride. You do believe me, Amalie?"

"Yes." Her voice was only a murmur. After a moment she said, "I was afraid you did not want me any longer. That was the only thing I could not have endured."

He took her face in his hands and kissed her lips gently. Then they sat close together, and Jerome said, "I have had a letter from my father today. Alfred"—he hesitated—"is obliged to remain in New York for two or three weeks longer. My father has asked me to go to Saratoga and bring him and Philip home. It will not be too hard for you, to be alone for a few days, Amalie?"

"No." Her face was sad again. "Philip. I love Philip so, Jerome. How can I bear to have him estranged from me? He trusts me, and loves me, and he has been so lonely."

He was quickly jealous, and frowned. "Oh, Philip. You need not fear for Philip. He has quite a mind of his own. Even his father could not prevent him from seeing you, if he wished."

But her sadness was heavy in the droop of her head. "I am only sorry that we must hurt those who trust us," she said. "If I could only be sure that they will not hate us so much!"

He smiled unpleasantly. "That is a possibility we must face also. And the sooner the better."

She stood up and walked restlessly up and down the room. "There is another thing I must tell you, Jerome. Dorothea knows."

He regarded her with disbelief. "But how? That is impossible."

She flushed and looked away. "Nevertheless, she knows I saw you today, and she accused me of everything. I did not intend to tell you. But I think, now, that you should know."

He stared at her. "You must tell me all about it, at once."

She told him, in a low voice thick with shame, and he listened with increasing rage. When Amalie had finished, he started toward the doorway, but she caught his arm.

"Wait, Jerome," she pleaded. "I think we need not fear Dorothea. She—wants Alfred. I—I have persuaded her that the less she pretends to know—about us—the more likely it is that Alfred will turn to her. She will say nothing. I beg of you not to allow her to know that I have told you."

"So that is why she has been so confoundedly vicious," he said. "Well, she deserves Alfred, and he deserves her. I could wish neither of them a better punishment."

"Jerome!" Amalie's voice was a cry of pain.

But he was excited. "Your Alfred is no saint! I have looked at his books and his ledgers. Do you know what he is doing to this town? He is keeping the people half starved and hopeless. He grabs farm after farm, forecloses mortgages, rents out those farms to sharecroppers whom he gouges and subjugates. That is the pious gentleman you would spare, Amalie."

She was silent, thinking of stories she had heard in Riversend, when she had taught school there. She was remembering the Hobsons, who would have been dispossessed but for her intercession.

Jerome misunderstood her silence. "I tell you," he went on, "that I will do all I can to frustrate him! You may as well know that now. I will remain here, and work, and everything that he has done will be undone."

She put out her hand and laid it on his arm. "Jerome!" she cried softly. "Do you mean that? That is why you are staying? You really wish to help Riversend and the farmers? You are not just staying—for your inheritance? You really want to do all this?"

Jerome smiled. He put his hand over the hand on his arm. "Yes, dear," he said.

She began to cry, and he knew she was crying with joy and amazement. He took her in his arms, and pressed her cheek against his. She clung to him.

"You don't know how happy you have made me, Jerome. I did not know that you thought these things about Riversend. I thought it was just hatred for Alfred. I've misjudged you. Forgive me."

When Jerome had gone to Saratoga a heavy somberness settled over the house. Dorothea went to her room immediately upon completing her household tasks. She seldom spoke to Amalie except when necessary, and her voice was dull and remote.

The servants sensed the tension in the house. They knew that it lay between the two women. They did not have any fondness for Amalie. She had come from their own class, and they resented her new estate. She was an "upstart," and so they were as impertinent to her as they dared to be.

Amalie longed for, and yet dreaded, the return of the family. She felt herself completely friendless. Jerome had been gone for three weeks, and there was no immediate sign of his return with his father and Philip. Alfred wrote that negotiations with Mr. Regan were unavoidably extended. Finally she found that days would pass with hardly a word exchanged between herself and Dorothea and the servants.

Her sickness became stronger. She debated whether or not she should call upon Doctor Hawley. But the thought of entering the village made her shrink.

One morning she summoned enough strength to visit the gardens, and returned to the house with a basket of roses. She arranged them in the library vases. She heard a small sound and turned to see Jim sidling into the room.

He came to her, glanced behind him quickly, then whispered, "Ma'am. Mr. Jerome will return on the thirtieth, he says."

Amalie's hands remained among the roses. She gazed at Jim in pale silence.

He studied her with anxiety and fondness. "If you'll pardon me, ma'am, but you're ailin'! It's the heat, perhaps? Sometimes I can't abide it."

She tried to smile. She thrust roses into cool water. "It is bad, isn't it, Jim?"

He cleared his throat. "The master won't like it at all, ma'am."

A thin color ran into her cheeks. "What do you mean, Jim?"

"He told me to look after you, Miss Amalie. He'll not like to see you like this." He came closer, staring at her earnestly. "Ma'am, I want you to know you've got a friend in this 'ouse."

She was so weak now that tears came easily to her eyes. "I know I have, Jim, and thank you."

"If there's anythin' I can do, ma'am, you've just got to let me know."

"Yes, Jim." She touched his arm with her chilled fingers, then moved away, her head high.

He followed her with his eyes, and sighed. A lovely young creature, this, and a lady, for all they said in the servants' quarters. He did not blame the master much. Still, it was a mess.

Next day Amalie received a letter from Alfred saying that he was on the way home. The news unnerved her completely. When she tried to get up the next morning she found herself too ill, overcome with an apathy which she could not shake off. And so it was that Alfred found her, almost unable to speak, unable to lift her head from her pillows.

AMALIE awoke, lifting eyes heavy with lassitude. The sun thrust, a bar of hot yellow steel, through the part in the draperies. She discovered that she was alone. Alfred had spent his first night at home on the couch in the dressing room in order that he might not disturb her. She raised herself on her elbow, feeling the warm moist weight of her hair on her neck and shoulders, and sickening under it. Her whole body was invaded by that sickness. She fell back on her pillows and moaned. All at once consciousness seemed too terrible to bear; she closed her eyes, pulled the sheet over her shoulders.

The dressing-room door opened softly, and Alfred tiptoed into the room in his crimson dressing gown. He came to the bed. She opened her eyes, and when she saw him his silhouette suddenly melted with the flood of her tears. He drew a rocker to the bedside and sat there, watching her with intense gravity and sadness. She wiped her eyes, then stared at him blindly.

He said, "What is it, my darling? Are you ill?"

She stirred, tried to lift herself on her pillows. He stood up and helped her competently. The effort had exhausted her.

Alfred said in quick anxiety, "I have sent for Doctor Hawley. Amalie, what has happened to you? Can't you tell me?"

The long bar of light brightened until the room was suffused with a warm incandescent dusk. Amalie thought, I ought to tell him, now, while we are alone. But her lips and tongue were numb and stiff.

Alfred waited for her to answer, then, sighing, went to the silver pitcher and bowl on the commode, dipped a linen towel in the cool water, and returned with it. With slow and gentle hands he wiped Amalie's hot white face. He smoothed back her hair tenderly. Then he sat down again.

"Amalie," he said, "if you are unhappy, you must tell me, so I can help you." He leaned toward his wife and took one of her cold hands.

Amalie bent her head, and the veil of her black hair swept across her cheek. She whispered, "Yes. Yes."

"What do you mean, Amalie? Am I to blame for something which has changed you so terribly, and has made you so ill?"

Her head bent even lower. "Oh, no, no, Alfred. It is not you. You are everything that is kind and good. It is I who am wrong."

Alfred was silent, but his hand tightened about hers.

There was a subdued knock on the door, and Jim entered, carrying Amalie's breakfast tray. Alfred frowned. What was Jerome's man doing here, instead of a female servant? He stood up and coldly took the tray from Jim. "I will be down shortly for my breakfast," he said. He watched the little man retreating and thought there was something furtive in his movements.

Alfred looked down at the tray with concern and distaste. There was only a plate of hot toast there, and a silver pot of tea. "Is this all you eat in the mornings, Amalie?" He lifted the silver cover from the toast.

"No. Please," said Amalie, in a voice of husky misery. "I am afraid I do not want it."

"Nonsense. You have neglected yourself. We must stop this foolishness."

He waited again. But Amalie only looked emptily at the tray on her knees. Alfred moistened lips, suddenly dry and salty.

"Once you asked me to take you away from this house, to build a home for you and me and Philip. I was wrong, perhaps, in insisting that we remain, even though Uncle William gave me the impression that eventually this house will belong to me. Amalie, my love, if it will make you happier, we will leave."

AMALIE'S fingers touched the warm teacup. She tried to lift it, but it seemed too heavy for her. Alfred raised the cup to her lips. She drank a little.

"Is that what you would wish, darling, to have a home of our own?"

She thought, If I had never seen Jerome! She forced herself to speak. "Alfred, you ought not to have married me. You are too good for me, and I am afraid."

This so touched Alfred that some of his fear and alarm disappeared. "Nonsense! We shall have the happiest life, my darling. I will not press you now, but I do hope that soon you will help me to decide whether we shall stay here or not. I want only the best and the most satisfying, for you." He left her side and began to walk up and down the room. "I ought not to have left you," he said tenderly. "I ought to have taken you with me. But I thought—I thought ——"

"Yes," she said with bitter simplicity, "you ought to have taken me."

Again he was pleased, and touched. He hesitated. "You are sure that you cannot join me at breakfast?"

"No. Please." She closed her eyes. "I think I prefer to remain in bed for a little longer, Alfred."

"Yes. Perhaps that is best. Doctor Hawley will be here at nine, and we must have his opinion." He bent and kissed her forehead. Then he retired to the dressing room, where he dressed for breakfast. When he opened the door again Amalie pretended to have fallen into a doze.

She heard him go down the stairs. Acid tears burned her eyelids. Then she forced herself to get out of bed. She stood by the window and looked out. The valley below floated in a heat haze beneath a sky like a hot opal.

Amalie turned from the window. She began to shiver in spite of the heat, and she was transfixed with pain.

She bathed her face and hands, combed and brushed her hair and then twisted it in long black braids that fell far below her waist. She fastened a long dressing gown about her. Then, overcome once again by that strange fainting sensation, she sat down in a chair near the window. She began to rock a little, her face stiff and passive between the black braids of hair.

All at once she had a poignant sense of approaching calamity. She started to her feet, staggered, caught at the curtain beside the window. She must get away from this house at once! She ran to her wardrobe and tore out a light gown of flounced dimity tied with cherry ribbons. She snatched a wide hat of yellow straw, a pair of black slippers from the floor. She laid out her lace petticoats, her stockings, her corset. Her hands were trembling and fumbling. She did not hear the grating of Doctor Hawley's buggy on the gravel drive below. She did not hear his voice and Alfred's rising up the staircase. When the door opened she started back so frantically, clutching a petticoat to her breast, that she had the air of a prisoner caught in the midst of despairing flight.

"Well, well," began DoctorHawley,cheerfully, "so here we are!"

"She seems to be better," said Alfred, with pleased surprise. "You decided to dress, my love?"

Moderate riches will carry you: if you have more, you must carry them.

Of big words and feathers many go to the pound.

But Doctor Hawley had paused. His smile disappeared. He saw Amalie's face, frenzied and distraught. He saw her eyes, darting from him to her husband like the eyes of a cornered animal.

Alfred moved toward his wife, but Doctor Hawley held him back."Alfred, may I talk to Amalie alone? Would you wait outside for a few moments?"

Alfred turned to the doctor, frowning.

"You see," said Doctor Hawley with elaborate casualness, "a lady sometimes tells her doctor—things—which might embarrass her before her husband." Doctor Hawley gently pushed Alfred toward the door. "It will take only a few moments," he said. "Then I'll call you."

Amalie saw Alfred's pale and anxious face until the closing door shut it away from her. Then she sank down upon the side of the bed, still clutching her petticoat, and her head dropped forward.

DOCTOR HAWLEY watched her for several moments. "Why are you frightened, my dear?" asked the doctor at last.

Amalie replied faintly, "I am not frightened."

"Yes, you are. And you are very ill." He took her hand, felt its coldness, felt the pounding beat of her pulse. He regarded her gravely. Then he drew a chair close to her and sat down.

Alfred paced uneasily up and down the upper hall. The grandfather clock below chimed the quarter hour and he glanced at his watch. He ought to be at the bank now, with his dispatch case of papers. He was not accustomed to being home on weekdays, and this gave him a sense of disturbing unreality. He heard the swinging of a door downstairs, and saw Dorothea's white ruffled cap. She looked up at him and began to mount the stairs.

"I heard Doctor Hawley come," she said. "What is wrong with Amalie?"

"I do not know yet. I am still waiting." He paused, then said with rare impulsiveness, "Stay with me, Dorothea."

"Do not distress yourself," she said. "I have been with Amalie all these weeks, and I assure you that she has not been very ill."

"She appeared so this morning."

Dorothea shrugged. "The excitement of your return, perhaps." She hesitated, then touched Alfred's sleeve briefly. "This is not like you," she told him. "Again I assure you that Amalie is not ill. She has been suffering from the heat."

HE looked down at the hand on his sleeve and, again with an impulsiveness unusual for him, he pressed his fingers over it. "Dear Dorothea." He was surprised when she snatched her hand away. Her austere face flushed crimson. "What is wrong?" he asked.

"Nothing. Nothing at all, Alfred. But I wish you would not treat me as if I were your grandmother." She gave a short, unmirthful laugh. "After all, I am not quite thirty-seven."

Females were certainly unpredictable, thought the bewildered Alfred. "I am sorry," he said, though he did not know why he should be. "Certainly you are younger than I. But you have always been so reliable, my dear, and so competent ——"

"Perhaps," she interrupted dryly, "it would have been better for me not to have been so reliable, and so competent."

This novel idea so distracted Alfred that he did not hear Doctor Hawley emerging, and started when he heard his voice.

"Well, well," said Doctor Hawley, "we can have hopes, after all. The happy occasion—er—must have occurred just before you left Riversend, about two months ago." He put his hand on Alfred's shoulder. "This time I think we can make our plans. I do indeed."

All at once every sound in the house appeared to die away, and there was a profound and echoless silence.

The physician said in a more insistent voice, "Don't you understand, Alfred? Your wife will present you with an heir in about six and one half months."

Alfred said huskily, "That is impossible. You are mistaken."

The doctor smiled. "I've just completed—ah—quite an intensive examination of Miss Amalie," he said. "You can be assured, this time."

Alfred said nothing, but the grayness deepened on his face. Then, with a terrible effort, he repeated, "You are mistaken."

The smile left the physician's face. He said, "May I talk to you alone for a moment, Alfred? Is there somewhere we can go?"

Alfred gestured stiffly at the closed door of Mr. Lindsey's bedroom. He went to the door, opened it, and Doctor Hawley followed. Alfred closed the door. He said expressionlessly, "I have told you it is impossible. You must say you are mistaken."

"Alfred," said the doctor quietly, "I am not mistaken. I thought you would be delighted."

"I would be delighted—if it were true. But it is not possible. I have not—I have had nothing to do with my wife for months. So you must understand that it is impossible."

Doctor Hawley fumbled for a chair and sat down, pulled out his kerchief and passed it over a face that was cold and damp. He muttered, "Perhaps I am mistaken. I ——" Then he could speak no more.

There was a deep silence in the room. "No," said Alfred, after a time, and very quietly, "I see that you are not mistaken."

He waited. The doctor, an old and stricken man, twisted his handkerchief over and over in his fingers.

"You have told—my wife?" said Alfred.

"Yes."

"What did she say?"

Breath entered the doctor's lungs painfully. "She—seemed stunned. She is very ill." He wrung the handkerchief more tightly over his fingers. "But it is still possible that I am mistaken. God forgive me! There have been mistakes before."

Alfred walked to the door, opened it. "Good afternoon, Doctor Hawley."

The doctor pushed himself to his feet. He exclaimed, "Alfred, you must be reasonable! It is quite possible that I am wrong. In any event, she is terribly ill, poor creature. There are symptoms which are misleading ——"

But Alfred stood by the door, waiting. The doctor passed through it. Alfred remained in his uncle's room until he heard the outer door close. Then he went back to his own apartments, and entered.

Amalie was fully dressed. She had filled her old straw valise with hastily packed clothing. As she heard Alfred enter, she swung about.

If there had been the slightest doubt in Alfred's mind before, there was none as he saw Amalie's preparations for flight.

He shut the door and stood with his back to it.

He said, "It is true, Amalie?"

There was no terror in her eyes now, only a frozen steadfastness. "Yes."

"Did you know before Doctor Hawley came?"

"No. Had I known, I should have left days ago." Then she said, "Forgive me, Alfred."

He regarded her almost musingly. "Who is it, Amalie?"

But she only said, "Forgive me."

"I only want to know why you did this, why you betrayed me. You see, I must understand. What have I done to you?"

"Nothing! It was nothing you did, Alfred." She put her hands to her throat. "You should never have married me. You must let me go. Let me go out of this house and forget that I ever lived."

"You may leave this house," Alfred told her. "But, first, I want to know who your—who the man is."

"I can't tell you," she whispered.

He struck her heavily in the face. Darkness rushed against her, smothered her. She did not even feel her fall to the floor. She lay in a swimming pool of blackness, which slowly revolved. From far off she heard a cry, heard the sound of a dim struggle about her.

At last she opened her eyes, and she saw that from somewhere Dorothea had appeared. Dorothea had thrown her arms about Alfred. Amalie heard her voice, beseeching, "No, Alfred, you must not touch her again! You must not do this! If you kill her, what will happen to you? She is not the only one to blame, believe me! If you will wait, I will tell you ——"

Amalie raised herself on her elbow. She cried out, "No, Dorothea, no! You must not tell him!" Her head was swimming. Something warm and sticky was oozing over her chin and lips, something salty and sickening. A horrible pain was beginning to strike at her.

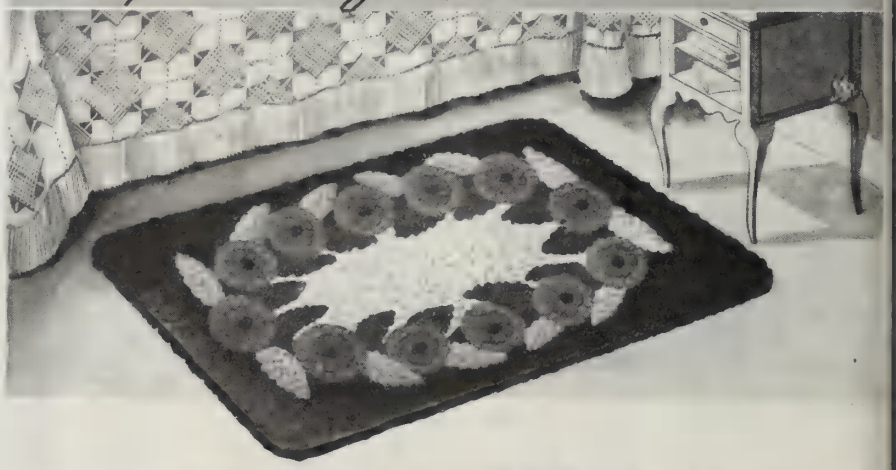
But neither of the others seemed to hear her. Amalie tried to get up. On hands and knees, she began to move toward them.

Alfred said, almost inaudibly, "What are you saying, Dorothea?"

"No!" cried Amalie. She had finally reached the woman, grasped her dress in weak hands.

But Dorothea apparently did not hear her. She was looking at Alfred. "There was a storm," she said. "He knew I was away, and she must have been frightened. I—I do not know, exactly ——"

Alfred regarded his cousin steadfastly. "You are not trying to tell me, Dorothea ——"



"Yes, Alfred."

"Jerome," he whispered.

Amalie let Dorothea's dress slip from her grasp. She lay in a curled heap upon the floor, once more sinking into darkness.

Alfred Lindsey looked about the neat bare bedroom in the Hobson farmhouse where Amalie had spent the two years before her marriage to him. He deposited her valise on the floor. Mrs. Hobson, who had asked no questions, and knew she must not ask them, bustled in meekly behind Alfred and Amalie, carrying a kerosene lamp. She placed it on the table, then left the room.

Amalie removed her bonnet and shawl, and hung them on one of the nails driven into the wall. Alfred watched her in silence. They had not spoken to each other since that terrible day. What Alfred had had to convey to Amalie had been done through Dorothea. Amalie had remained in her bedroom until today.

Dorothea hated Amalie; but when she took the trays to her sister-in-law's room, when she saw that bruised face and the filmed eyes, something contracted in her heart, and something like virulent anger against Alfred pervaded her. Only by sternly recalling Alfred's provocation was she able to forgive him.

It had frightened and repelled Dorothea that she had been able to pity Amalie; it threw her into the wildest uncertainty when she discovered that she had had to check herself, on several occasions, from speaking to Amalie with concern and sympathy in her voice.

Three dreadful days had passed. Dorothea waited, knowing that Alfred was making some plan.

When he finally announced that he was taking Amalie back to the Hobson farm, her relief was almost hysterical. She conveyed this information to Amalie, who made no reply. However, on the designated afternoon, in the midst of a heavy rainstorm, Dorothea discovered that Amalie was quite prepared when she went to summon her.

The servants were not visible; Dorothea had seen to that. Alfred was waiting below, pulling on his gloves, his greatcoat buttoned. He had not looked at Amalie directly. But he had taken her valise from her hand. Dorothea watched them go, and could not understand the sick pain which weakened her.

The buggy curtains were drawn; they had sat side by side for the last time. Alfred stared straight ahead, grasping the reins. He was to remember that ride all his life, and never without the freshness of new agony and sorrow and despair.

The Hobsons, informed briefly to expect Mrs. Lindsey, were waiting. They seethed with curiosity, but they would not question. Mrs. Lindsey, they had been told, would remain with them at their farm for a few weeks.

And now Amalie and Alfred stood in this room. He saw her bruised and swollen cheek in the dusky lamplight; he saw the unblinking fixity of her eyes. There was nothing to keep him here now. But still he could not leave.

He that can't paint must grind colors.

He said hoarsely, "I believe you have agreed to remain in this house until after the divorce, Amalie."

Amalie's white lips moved. She said, "Yes."

"Is there anything else you wish?"

She shook her head.

He moved toward the door, turned again. "Have you anything to say to me, Amalie?"

Slowly she turned her face fully toward him. "Yes!" she said. "Forgive me, Alfred. You have not told me that you forgive me."

He was silent, trembling. "Oh, Amalie," he said. And then again, "Oh, Amalie!"

She did not move, only stared at him eagerly, pathetically.

"I forgive you. Yes, I forgive you, Amalie." And then he said a strange thing: "And do you forgive me?"

"There is nothing for me to forgive," she said gently. "You have given me a little peace, Alfred."

His own grief was unendurable. He took a step toward her. "Amalie," he said, "if you need anything, at any time, will you let me know?"

But she said, "No. You must forget me as soon as possible."

He could not restrain himself from crying, "But what will you do, Amalie?"

She shook her head. "I do not know yet. Go home, Alfred. Don't think of me again." She turned away from him and he went on through the door.

Though Jerome had spent much time with his father in Saratoga, he had refrained from discussing the bank and his own plans. For the old gentleman, to Jerome's alarm, appeared much weakened. When he consulted the physician, he was informed that Mr. Lindsey's heart was steadily if slowly failing, and that any unusual excitement or anxiety might cause a collapse.

Then, on the day they were to leave for Riversend, Mr. Lindsey received a delayed letter from Alfred, in New York. "I thought of coming to Saratoga myself," Alfred had written, "but now that Jerome is with you, and there are pressing matters which must be attended to at home at once, I have regretfully decided to go there instead."

So, thought Jerome, I must talk to my father now.

He had only four hours before the train left. Mr. Lindsey sat in his room, reading his newspapers. He and Jerome were alone, for Philip had gone for a last stroll over the hotel's grounds. Jerome seemed absorbed in a volume of Charles Lamb.

He looked up, smiled at his father. "May I read you this small selection?"

Mr. Lindsey's smile was amused. "Jerome, you are never casual. Read me the selection, and I will try to guess your underlying motive."

Jerome laughed and began to read: "'A garden was the primitive prison, till man, with Promethean felicity and boldness, luckily sinned himself out of it. Thence followed Babylon, Nineveh, Venice, London, haberdashers, goldsmiths, taverns, playhouses, satires, epigrams, puns—these all came in on the town part, and the thither side of innocence.'"

Mr. Lindsey folded his transparent hands together. His smile still lingered. "Well? So we are on this side of innocence, you are implying? The day of the 'garden' is done?"

Jerome, as usual, was delighted by his father's perception. "Yes, of course. But Alfred doesn't realize that."

Mr. Lindsey was silent, and suddenly grave.

"In other words," Jerome continued, "Alfred believes that power and wealth live only in the land. For that reason, it is essential for him to prevent any invasion of our community by the new industrial spirit. That is because he feels vulnerable. His kind can exist only in the atmosphere of the status quo."

He paused. But Mr. Lindsey was still thoughtfully silent.

Jerome continued: "He knows that if he continues in the old way he risks nothing, and he and the bank will remain secure. He isn't attracted to expansion, for new industries in Riversend, he thinks, will threaten some of his control."

Mr. Lindsey said, "I am interested in your analysis of Alfred. Whether it is true or not, I am not yet prepared to say. But go on."

"Well, during my years in New York I often heard discussions between Jay Regan and his friends. I wasn't much interested at the time, but much of the talk now returns to me with exciting meaning. I know now that these men no longer vision an agrarian America—a country of small villages and towns—but the building of an industrial empire. A new democracy is coming into being, a capitalistic-industrial democracy, with opportunities for the enterprising individual that it is impossible to be too extravagant about. The emphasis is passing rapidly from the garden to the town. From the barn to the factory."

Mr. Lindsey coughed. "But you have forgotten one thing. Man is more than factories. He is life. I do not know if it is true, that America is passing from the garden to the town, from the barn to the factory, as you have said. But in an agrarian society, man is comparatively free. In an industrial society, I fear, he would be the bondsman of a few."

"Father, I have lived in large cities. I have felt the stir and urge of expansion since the war. I know that the future is in industry, transportation and building. And I know that banking must be a medium for adventure, to finance this new industry. Other banks realize this, but not ours. Because of Alfred. He sees the arching of the new tide above his head, and he is terrified. Of course, there are many like him. And these are the danger to America, the gray men, the little stony dwellers in the little stony towers. America will not be balked by them. But they can do much damage before they are eliminated. It is sad that, in their elimination, they will eliminate others too."

Love Song

BY MARYA ZATURENSKA

There is none, oh, none like you
  Through time and all estranging,
Ever wide the expanding view
  Through which my heart goes ranging.

Ever fruitful, ever new,
  The golden apples ever falling,
Still the silver streams pursue
  Through green rivers, falling, calling.

Ask not where old summers flew
  Or leaden hours now airy-light,
Nor where the cherry blossoms blew
  Nor what made dark winter bright.

In the brilliant, darkening blue
  Of your drowned eyes, drowned I lie;
There is none, oh, none but you
  In the harassed earth and sky.

Other lovers bid adieu
  When the sparkling seasons cease,
Still my wild heart follows you
  Trapped, imprisoned, yet at peace.

"Such as our bank," suggested Mr. Lindsey wryly.

Jerome nodded. "Yes."

Mr. Lindsey sighed, moved in his chair. "Alfred and I have had many discussions," he said reluctantly. "I know he believes that only land is stable. He believes that speculative business and industry are precarious. I can see his point of view."

But Jerome was suddenly elated. In spite of his father's noncommittal words, he felt a stir in him, a reluctant and secret agreement. "I know what is wrong with Alfred," said Jerome. "He was poor for so long that he is afraid, instinctively, that he might lose what he has gained. He is afraid to risk anything, even for the promise of greater prosperity."

Mr. Lindsey studied his son. "Jerome, what plans have you?"

Jerome had not expected this sudden capitulation. He had expected to argue long and tenaciously. So he could only stare for several moments at Mr. Lindsey, and his dark eyes, restless and extraordinarily alive, jerked in his narrow face.

Then swiftly, talking eagerly, he outlined his ideas. Mr. Lindsey leaned forward to hear. There was a flush on his transparent old cheek, a quick blue fire in his eyes.

Finally he said, "Jerome, you certainly sound—convincing!"

Jerome laughed. "You mean 'plausible,' do you not? I have always admired your precision of speech. Is this new slovenliness old age, or just good manners?"

Mr. Lindsey chuckled. "Well, I have always thought a good-mannered man slovenly. He is afraid to take up issues; he side-steps challenges." But Jerome waited impatiently. Mr. Lindsey glanced at his watch. "I believe it is time for us to prepare to go to the station, my boy."

The heavy twilight had settled down when they arrived at Riversend. Jerome had sent a telegram to Alfred, informing him of their hour of arrival. But the carriage which awaited was empty of all but the coachman.

Mr. Lindsey asked for news of the family. The coachman spoke cautiously. Miss Dorothea had one of her colds again, and was in bed. Mr. Alfred had been suddenly called away to Horton Hills on a matter of importance. He would return that night. He hesitated when asked of Amalie. The young lady, said the man, had not been too well.

Apprehension grew in Jerome. When the carriage drew up at the door he bounded out, impatiently assisted his father. He flung open the door of the house. There was no sound, and no one in sight.

"It is good to be home," said Mr. Lindsey wearily. He allowed Jerome to help him up the stairway.

The house seemed completely deserted. Philip went to his own room, and the quiet shutting of the door echoed through the corridor. But Mr. Lindsey's room had been prepared. There were late roses in glass bowls on the tables. His bed had been turned down.

"It almost seems as if we were unexpected," said Mr. Lindsey. "Dorothea must indeed be ill. And where are all the servants?"

"Never mind. Let me help you undress," said Jerome. He seized the bell rope. "We'll soon have someone here with tea for you." Jerome piled the pillows neatly under his father's tired head.

Mr. Lindsey smiled. "You have hands as tender as a woman's, my boy."

There was a knocking at the door. Jim appeared on the threshold with a steaming tray. He brought it carefully to Mr. Lindsey's bedside table. He asked if there was anything else he could do.

Jerome said quietly, "I will change, myself. And, Jim, will you bring me a tray too?"

"Yes, Mr. Jerome," said Jim. Their eyes met and held. Jerome went out into the corridor and listened. Still no sound. He felt Jim pluck at his sleeve. "Sir, please come into your room," the little man whispered. "There's bad trouble here."

They went into Jerome's room. Jim shut the door soundlessly behind them.

"I tried to warn you, sir. I sent a telegram. You didn't get it?"

"No. Out with it! What is the matter here?"

Jim put his hand urgently on Jerome's arm. "I don't know it all. They try to keep it from me. Mr. Alfred came 'ome and the young lady was ill in her bed. Mr. Alfred told one of the lads to go for the doctor. That was Monday night."

"Yes, yes, go on."

The little man's face twisted. "I tried to listen. But it was no go. I only know the doctor comes the next morning. Then, later, in Miss Amalie's room, I heard her scream. I didn't hear anythin' else, though I listened. Mr. Alfred didn't go to the bank at all. Still hasn't been. It was given out that Miss Amalie was ill and Miss Dorothea took her trays in and out. Then, two days ago Mr. Alfred took Miss Amalie away in the buggy."

Jerome caught his arm. "Where is she?"

Jim shook his head. "That I don't know, sir. There's been lots of talk. Nobody knows wot it's all abaht. There was Mr. Alfred's lawyers here, too, shut up with him in the library. That was last night."

Jerome pushed past Jim and went out of the room. He ran quickly down the stairs, reached the library door and flung it open.

Alfred was there, standing with bent head. He must have just come in, for his tall hat, his gloves and cane were laid on a table. He watched Jerome close the door behind him. His face was ashen, heavily furrowed.

"Where is Amalie?" asked Jerome. He stopped, and the two men looked at each other in a silence which grew more frightful with each slow second.

Alfred's lawyers had advised him well. "Remember," one of them had said, "Jerome Lindsey is the old gentleman's son. You've had the worst provocation any man can have. But the less violence and recrimination, the less you will get the old gentleman's back up. If you control yourself, it is likely that the old gentleman will send Jerome away."

The lawyers left out of their calculations the fact that Alfred had for his wife the deep passion and love which only a silent, restrained man can possess. They knew nothing of Alfred's tearing anguish at the very thought of her. Nevertheless, the lawyers' advice had been received by Alfred with more reason than they had believed. If Jerome had not burst in upon his cousin with the open challenge of his demand for Amalie, Alfred might have acted to the entire approval of his lawyers.

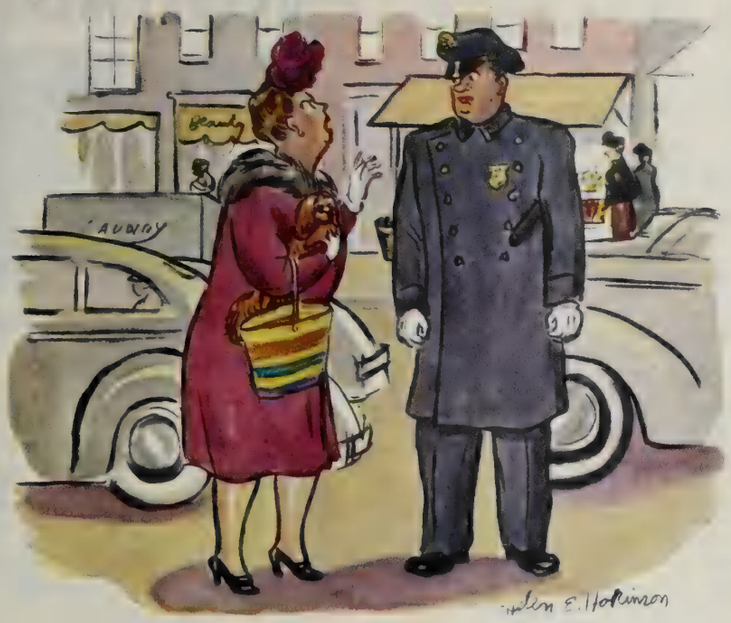
But when he saw Jerome now, all the advice of the lawyers was lost. In one flashing and terrible moment, Alfred saw the essence of all his years with his cousin. He remembered all the taunts, all the delicately vicious words and ridicule.

There was no reason left in Alfred now, no caution. The primordial man, rising heavily and fiercely, stood naked and terrible in Alfred's eyes. And it was this which had caused Jerome to stop suddenly, and to look at his cousin.

Jerome's first emotion was incredulousness. He had hardly thought of Alfred at all, except as a lumbering and faintly ridiculous figure. He saw now that he, Jerome, was a fool, and that his folly might cost him his life. He forgot Amalie in the pure instinct that awakens in a man when his very existence is threatened. He could only stare at Alfred with intense awareness and calculation.

Alfred did not know of his cousin's fear. He saw only that slightly lifted face, the stiff outthrust chin, those narrowed and penetrating eyes. He saw that the muscles about that insolent mouth had sprung out in thin cords. And then, suddenly, he knew that Jerome was afraid. He was afraid, this blackguard, this wretch. He was afraid, for the first time, of him, Alfred Lindsey!

Alfred said, "She is going to have a child—your child."



Jerome did not speak. Suddenly his eye leaped aside, looking for a weapon with which to defend himself. Alfred's words had not reached his complete consciousness. In fact, he hardly heard them.

Alfred noted the swift side glance. He saw his heavy cane on the table near him. His hand darted out, seized it. Before Jerome could move, Alfred had struck him savagely across the face.

Jerome staggered back, raising his arm to shield his face. The force of the blow sent him reeling. He heard a roaring in his ears; his vision was clouded, and through fog he saw Alfred looming over him. He saw his cousin's arm lifted again, and again, and yet he did not feel the blows that battered him. He had only one thought: escape. For now he knew, completely, that if he could not get away he would surely die.

Far off, in the dim reaches of space, he heard a cry. He no longer saw Alfred. He was floating in semidarkness, and he was conscious for the first time of an unbearable agony. He felt himself tossed and thrown off, sailing, swimming, and he saw before him a cloud of darkness which rushed closer and closer, spreading about him. Finally it engulfed him, and he sped into it, far from the pursuing agony of his own flesh.

Say Shefford for fine cheese

Homespun or high style

Homespun—Melted Shefford Cheese Sandwich

Everybody knows the ingredients:
A slice or two of bread, toasted
Generous slices of Shefford Cheese
(We suggest Shefford American or Shefford Chevelle Brand cheese food*)
A sprinkling of paprika

Put the cheese on the toast, sprinkle with paprika, and place under the broiler until cheese is melted—and the answer is good eating in a sandwich. It's that flavor of real cheese that makes a Shefford sandwich something extra in enjoyment.

High Style—Poularde au Fromage

Blend ⅓ cup flour with ½ cup cold chicken broth; add to 2 cups broth; cook in top of double boiler, stirring occasionally until thickened. Add dash red pepper, 1½ cups diced boiled or steamed chicken, 1 cup cooked peas. Add 4 oz. Shefford Chevelle Brand cheese food, diced (notice how smoothly it blends in). Remove from heat, stir until Chevelle is melted (one of the advantages of Chevelle is its faster melting). Add 2 hard-cooked eggs, sliced, and more salt if needed. Turn mixture into 1½ quart casserole.

Make a soft biscuit dough, substituting ½ cup yellow corn meal for same amount of all-purpose flour in your regular 2 cups flour biscuit recipe. Cut out small biscuits ⅓ in. thick. Brush tops with 2 teaspoons melted Blue Bonnet Margarine or butter; dip tops lightly into 1 tablespoon corn meal. Arrange biscuits on chicken-Chevelle mixture. Bake in hot oven (425° F.) about 30 minutes or until browned. Makes 6 servings. (Note that the mild, fine flavor of Chevelle enhances, not smothers, the other delicate flavors.)

You can use Shefford Cheese for the simplest sandwich or the most elaborate main dish. But whatever way you use it you'll get the same good flavor—the honest, natural flavor of fine cheese made from good milk by old-time cheese experts. 19 varieties and flavors—with solid food value.

I JUST LOVE A PARTY

thin slices. Round or long, it makes no difference. But eliminate the crusts. (I love bread pudding, don't you?) Spread each slice with the butter, then with a filling. The tongue mixture will do for spreading two layers, the others one each. You will have six layers of bread and five layers of filling. When put together, wrap in a damp towel and then in waxed paper. Chill in the refrigerator—best if you leave it wrapped overnight. Season regular cream cheese highly and add enough cream to make it whip up to be spreadable like your best frosting. Frost the cake with this. Decorate your "cake" with green pepper holly leaves and pimiento berries, or any appropriate decoration. Don't make a house with smoke coming out the chimney. I can't think of any way to make smoke. Keep it simple! Chill in the refrigerator. Cut into small slices, not wedges. Serve as you would sandwiches. You see, it turned out to be a sandwich cake, and is really easier than making a lot of different sandwiches.

This cake will probably make everyone think you're crazy, running a cake into such goings on as this, but you'll fool them; and what's more, most of them will go home with your receipt, and plenty of ideas for fillings of their own, and that will be music in your ears. I know. I have seen how it works.

Another grand slam. This, my dears, is none other than an Appetizer Plateau—it's really a tray of appetizers set up in plateau fashion. Shows off better, as you can see, but I don't see why we can't call it the supporting cast, for I know you have guessed long ago, having looked at the picture and all, that this plateau is designed for holding up those delicious little morsels we grab at so ravenously when we get to this kind of party. Just like me faced with a fine big angel cake. Can't leave it alone.

What's on the tray? First there's the pincushion. The thing into which you stick appetizers on toothpicks. Grapefruit, eggplant, apples and such have been used for years and years. We have used bread to make a plateau. Just plain unsliced sandwich or Pullman loaves from the bakery. Trim off the crusts, make two long blocks about fifteen inches long and three inches high, and one short block about eleven inches long and two inches high. You will cut your bread to fit your tray. Skewer the blocks of bread together with the short block on top of the other two. (You've played with blocks sometime in your life.) Brush lightly with salad oil and toast in the oven until golden brown. Place your plateau on your tray and arrange any appetizer you may wish to serve on it. (Maybe you will be having turkey soon and the bread will do for stuffing. I wouldn't advise another bread pudding.)

Now let's look into the appetizers on the plateau. First you'll notice, marching down the top—for indeed they could hardly get around very handily underneath—the cream-cheese-and-parsley Christmas trees. Maybe a little belated for Christmas trees; but don't be dated—it's still the holiday season.

PARSLEY-CHEESE CHRISTMAS TREES

Season cream cheese with Worcestershire sauce, Tabasco and salt to taste. Drop heaping teaspoonfuls on a plate of chopped parsley. Roll around until cheese is well coated with the parsley, then roll into cone shape. Stand up with the point of the cone at the top. Chill until firm. Put the end of a toothpick through the center of small round crackers. Top with cheese trees. Stick into bread plateau, eggplant, grapefruit or whatever you use as a holder. Decorate the tops of the trees with a tiny spotlight of red pimiento. Chill well.

Few things are so good, so wanted and so hunted down on any appetizer affair as cheese. Make it up into anything from Christmas trees to a night-blooming cereus—and that's going some. So, in case you need a brand-new and startling cheese pastry, I'll hand it right out now and be on my way.

CHEESE PASTRIES AS WE LIKE THEM

With a pastry blender chop ¾ cup of grated American cheese and ½ cup of butter or margarine into 1 cup of flour, mixed with ¼ teaspoon of salt and a dash of cayenne. Make into dough to be rolled. Chill. Roll out a small amount as thin as for pie-crust. Cut out with a small cutter, or mark into one-inch squares or diamonds. Put on greased cooky sheets. Sprinkle some with paprika and some with poppy or caraway seeds. Bake in a hot oven, 400° F., until puffy and golden. Don't overbake. They burn fast because they are rich, and they need watching. Store in a tin box when cool if not to be used at once.

Going on from here. We've got a lot to do with all these party plans coming up. No time to stop and visit, so I'll just jot down some of the other things that you might use as appetizers. There are any number of others. You will have your favorites.

"Sub Special." This was a favorite midnight snack on board our famous submarines. If you have some Navy boys at the party, they are pretty sure to like it. Drain 1 can of sardines, the kind that are packed in oil. Mash. Add 4 tablespoons of mayonnaise, ½ cup of chopped dill pickles packed with garlic, 1 tablespoon of pickle juice, 1 small onion, grated, a dash of Worcestershire sauce, juice of half a lemon, salt and pepper to taste. Spread on crackers, or use to fill tiny pastry tart shells.

Pickled Shrimp. To 1 cup of vinegar, add 2 tablespoons of water, a few whole cloves, dash of pepper, 1 bay leaf, 1 onion, sliced, 2 teaspoons of salt and 1 teaspoon of sugar. Bring to boil and pour over 1 pound of shrimps, cooked, shelled and veined. Let stand overnight or a day or two in jar in refrigerator. Drain and put on toothpicks. (Good in a regular shrimp salad too.)

Anchovy Radishes. Very simple: merely slice the tops off small crisp radishes, drain rolled anchovies and lay on top. Hold together with toothpicks for easy handling and eating.

Caviar and Smoked Salmon Canapés. Use rectangular or square crackers for a base. Mix a small jar of caviar with a little grated onion and a squeeze of lemon juice. Lay a strip of smoked salmon through center of buttered cracker. Put seasoned caviar on both sides.

Tiny Salami Biscuits. Make up half of your baking-powder-biscuit receipt. Roll thin (not more than a quarter inch thick). Cut out with small nickel-size cutter. Brush each round with unbeaten egg white and put two together, egg-white sides in, with a round slice of salami, cut just a little bigger, in between. Bake ten to twelve minutes in hot oven, 450° F. Serve hot.

Liver Pâté Egg Balls. To 1 can of prepared liver pâté add 1 tablespoon of prepared mustard and 1 tablespoon of finely minced onion. No additional seasoning. Chill. Shape into small balls and roll in the finely chopped whites and yolks of 2 hard-cooked eggs.

Appetizing suggestions. Instead of any of these you could have: (a) Slivers of ham rolled around small strips of watermelon pickle; (b) Slices of smoked turkey rolled up in horn shape filled with a good potato salad, the potatoes cut fine; (c) Minced radishes on toast rounds spread with highly seasoned butter—garnish with slice of black olive; (d) Large stuffed olives wrapped with anchovy fillet; (e) Very small ham sandwiches, dipped in fritter batter and fried in deep fat; (f) Nice pieces of lobster, well seasoned and rubbed with garlic—dip in fritter batter and fry; (g) I must get on to the next party.

Miniature smörgåsbord. How the Swedes do carry on with their smörgåsbords. And how everybody loves to eat their fixings. But there's one thing: unless a Swedish waiter is leaning over your shoulder you may pronounce it as you please. I was born in Vermont myself. I love a party, but I love being born in Vermont better. It means a lot more to me. Now there's one thing you always find on every smörgåsbord, and that's fish balls and meat balls. If this causes an international incident, why, that is just too bad. But I stand on the historical fact that the fish ball came from New England.

So, instead of Swedish fish balls you'll do well to stick to my well-known and much admired receipt for fish balls which you've made so many times. Make them into the littlest things, like glass agates. (Do you remember them in the old gingham marble bag?) Fry them and fry them in scads. Drain. Dust with a dusting of paprika. Keep them hot; let the guests stab with a toothpick and watch them disappear like—well, don't watch. We're all human, aren't we? And no sauce or fancy work on these. Seasoned right, they'll be perfect. And now New England gives the floor to Sweden. After all, this is a Swedish kind of party.

SWEDISH MEAT BALLS (KOTTBULLAR)

Have ground by that be-aproned grinder man at your favorite market ¾ pound of beef, or part veal and part beef, ¾ pound of pork, and for this special receipt have him put it through the grinder twice. Soak 1 cup of grated bread crumbs in ½ cup of milk and add with a beaten egg to the meat. Season well with salt and pepper, a pinch of thyme, one of marjoram and one of allspice. Stir in ⅓ cup of finely chopped onion. Shape into small balls. Dust with flour, brown in fat on all sides in a large skillet. Lift out about a dozen at a time, as they brown. When all are browned, add water to the fat, return the meat balls and simmer until tender and gravy has thickened from the drippings. This makes nearly a hundred very small meat balls. Use half the quantity for a smaller party.

Now for some of the other things. Pickled herring you can buy, also headcheese and sardines in tomato sauce, but an aspic you should have to adorn your spread. And here is one.

SHRIMP-AND-VEGETABLE ASPIC

Cook, shell and vein 1 pound of fresh shrimp. Season lightly. Have ready 1 cup of cooked peas seasoned with salt; and 1 cup of shredded carrots seasoned with salt and mixed with 1 tablespoon of chopped onion. Now soften 1 envelope of unflavored gelatin in ½ cup of cold water. Add ¼ cup of lemon juice, 2 tablespoons of sugar, 1¼ teaspoons of salt, ¼ teaspoon of Worcestershire sauce, a few drops of Tabasco sauce and a dash of pepper. Mix thoroughly and add 1 cup of boiling water—stir until dissolved. Cool. Arrange half of the shrimp on the bottom of a quart-size mold, cover with gelatin mixture. Chill until firm. For the second layer use the cup of cooked peas and cover with gelatin mixture. Chill till firm. Repeat this same procedure for the third layer, using the shredded carrots and chopped onion. After this layer is solid, finish the mold with the other half of the shrimp and the rest of the gelatin mixture. Chill until firm, unmold and serve.

Not beyond your ken. Now for two or three things you may have forgotten or your mother never told you. Don't neglect salads at any party. Or oysters in cocktail sauce, hot clam juice, all sorts of bread and rolls and buttered temptations. Olives and pickles? Why, of course. And for your smörgåsbord, if any Scandinavians are there, you should have one thing I almost forgot.

HERRING-AND-BEET SALAD

To 1 cup of diced pickled herring, add 2 apples, cut fine, 4 or 5 cooked potatoes, diced, 5 or 6 beets cut into strips, and 2 tablespoons of minced onion. Season with salt and pepper. Mix 1 cup of sour cream with 2 tablespoons of mayonnaise, a little sugar and vinegar to season. Mix with the fish, vegetables and apples. Marinate in refrigerator for at least an hour.

And last—because, I guess, one always keeps the last note of Home Sweet Home till the last swish of taffeta at the dance you don't forget—I've kept some of the things I like best. Just simple things.

Smoked Salmon Cucumber Rolls. Season cream cheese with salt and pepper and add finely chopped cucumber. Spread slices of smoked salmon with this. Roll up and chill.

Dill Cheese. Add sour cream to cottage cheese to make it creamy. To 1 pound of cottage cheese add 3 tablespoons of sour cream and ½ teaspoon of dried dill. Salt and pepper, of course.

Lobster Stuffed Eggs. One small lobster or 1 can of lobster meat, cut into small pieces, mixed with mayonnaise and sieved egg yolk, lemon juice, salt and pepper, will stuff about 10 hard-cooked-egg halves.

After which I shall bow myself out, change my shoes, brush my hair, give a last look in the kitchen mirror and go to the party. I just love this part of it—I love a party!

THE TRANSFORMATION

with his cattle. He was unchanging, outwardly content in his loneliness—tall, rough-handed, blunt. Somehow he gave the impression of a man cut from the society of other men by the mere fact that he did not know their language of casual talk and quick laughter, and could not learn it.

I used to ride through a corner of his pasture, and I found him there one morning stretching wire on fence posts. His tools were a small bar with a claw in it, and a hammer. He would catch the wire in the claw, then draw it taut against the post and staple it. Twice while I watched he broke the heavy strands as if they were clotheslines, because when his strength began to pour through his massive arms, he seemed unable to check it—though of course when he was finished his fence was tighter than anyone else's.

When the work was done, and not until then, he looked up and nodded. In the bright Kenya sun his large tanned face was for once striking and a little pathetic. He wiped sweat from his jaws and his neck and stood waiting for my opinion of his place. I could see the question in his eyes. They were like the eyes of an arrogant child demanding praise. But at the same time they were guarded and sharp with challenge.

We were on a rise of ground, and from my saddle I could look over his farm. It was finished. It was so complete, so precisely arranged that it might have been a painting by a commercial draftsman. It was too orderly, and I felt that even the cattle had taken their places in the various fields out of deference to the whole design.

"What do you think of it?" he said.

"You've made a fine thing of it. It's like a blueprint—exactly like a blueprint."

The comparison pleased him. He looked proudly at what he had built. Then at once he turned on me in frowning petulance.

"Good," he said, "good! Then tell me this. You've lived here all your life, and you know Anne Barton. If my farm is what you say it is—is there any reason why she shouldn't want to live on it?"

Perhaps a Breton peasant might have asked that question—some man to whom a woman was no more than a practical complement to his cow barns, his henhouse and his kitchen. But Craig was no peasant.

"There's nothing wrong with your farm," I said. "But women don't marry farms. Not Anne, at least, and it's time you knew it."

He only shrugged. "She can't live on dreams," he said, "or on air—especially with a man who spends most of his time in the middle of one or the other." It was an obvious reference to Larry, and it was sharper for the truth that was in it. But more than that there was disdain in it, and contempt.

"It's true that Larry is no farmer," I said. "He'd be no good at it. But then, you're no flier—and probably if you tried you would be no good at that."

He straightened immediately and cocked his head a little to one side, as if he couldn't believe what I had said, and I knew that I had blundered. He was no man to admit inferiority in anything, and now he felt challenged, though indirectly, by a man he instinctively and jealously hated.

"A plane is a machine, isn't it?" he said.

I nodded. "A plane is a machine." It would have been futile, I thought, to point out that such planes as we then flew were something more than just machines—and something less. They were fledgling things of wood and wire and cloth. More often than not they were equipped with engines too powerful for their fragile frames, or—as in Larry's Klemm—with an engine so feeble as almost to require of the pilot the sensitive touch of a pianist to keep them in harmony with the weather and the wind.

And yet John Craig was saying, "I know machines. I can handle machines, though I never thought it much of a way to test a man. Still, it seems the idea appeals to women—men in ships, men in planes, men with their feet off the ground. Well, if that's what's wanted, it's easy enough. I'll fly."

It seemed at the moment no more than a boast born out of simple masculine pride. It was as if he had said, "I know women. I can handle women!"

I reined my horse toward my father's farm. Glancing back, I saw that Craig had undertaken to split a log of cedar for his fence. He did not do it patiently by the use of a wedge and hammer, but by wrathful, even wild, blows of his enormous ax; and somehow that picture came into my mind at once when, two days later, to the astonishment of both Larry and myself, Craig strode across the Nairobi airport and demanded that Larry teach him to fly.

It was a strange and disquieting moment. Nurtured by silence, the enmity of each toward the other had grown and had taken the formless and unreasonable shape of all things that thrive without light. There was no understanding—not even enough for anger.

They looked at each other for a moment: Larry, slender, motionless, outwardly at ease, smiling his bittersweet smile; and Craig, big, but bigger still with arrogance, framed in the hangar door. Craig held a scrap of newspaper in his hand. It was the small advertisement Larry had run for months, not really to increase his income but to please some insistent friend who sold such ads. There it was, in John Craig's hand, and he was saying:

"You're Abbot, aren't you? Well, as you know, I'm John Craig, and I want to fly. You can show me the tricks."

All the condescension in the world was in his voice—all the patronizing inflection of the sturdy realist addressing the dreamer. And the dreamer might easily have laughed him away. It was what I hoped for—expected, I think. But there were more subtle shades to Larry's nature. I looked at his face and saw that he was still smiling his dry, mirthless smile. His gray eyes, aglow with irony, were very steady and very thoughtful. He knew the challenge for what it was. He shifted his glance from Craig's face to Craig's massive hands that were like great, insensitive clamps. Then he looked with meaning at the fragile little plane already shivering on the runway under the morning wind. The plane was sky-blue, and on its fuselage was neatly painted the name: "ANNE." He turned to me and nodded toward the scrap of newsprint in John Craig's hand.

"The power of the printed word," he said, smiling his sardonic smile; "it brings all things to all men. All right, Craig, we fly."

They took off at once: Larry at the controls, with more than a hint of disdain in his manner; Craig in the rear cockpit, his shoulders squared in arrogance. And when at last the little craft was airborne, droning its reproach against the sky, I could not help thinking that no smaller world could be contrived for two men so hateful of each other. But in an instant they were gone, with time and the distance closed behind them, and I went about my own work, servicing my own plane for a routine flight to Mombasa.

What happened after that is difficult to tell, because a part of the story is lost.

I returned just before dark, landing my Avian on the rough plot we called an airport, and I saw then that Larry Abbot and John Craig had not come back. There was no word, nor any sign of them, but I was not immediately worried. I saw to it that flares were lighted on the edges of the runway, and then I went into Nairobi telling myself that they would come in by night.

But they did not come in that night, nor the next night, nor the night after that, and there was no message. There was nothing.

On the second day I went to Anne and told her what had happened, and I saw at once that she was afraid for Larry—for both of them. She did not hate John Craig, but she feared the fury of his jealousy and strength. And she knew Larry; she knew his tenacity, his determination to humiliate the big man. It was like a knife against a bludgeon.

"It's not just a legend," she said, "that this country does strange things to men. They get drunk on the bigness of it. They throw restraint away, and reason goes with it. They should not be together in that plane!"

She was not given to hysteria, but she was deeply concerned. I watched her pace her tiny, cluttered workshop—a slender, vital yet very feminine girl. Almost a child, I thought, and it came to me that she was out of place among her pedestals and lumps of clay. It was make-believe, and I suddenly knew why, because I remembered that once she had stood with a clay figure that she had made, and had looked at it heavy in her hand, and then had softly said, "I wish it were a child—my child." It was a thing that Larry could never understand because it would have meant the sacrifice of his constant flirtation with unreality. It would have meant responsibility, regularity, worry—the coarser threads that go into the weaving of happiness. Nor could John Craig have understood it.

I stood up and moved toward the door. "I'll take off in the morning," I said, "toward Marsabit. They went north."

We had no radios then; nor any short-wave station in East Africa, for that matter. When a plane vanished, you did the simple thing: you looked for it, hoping that if it had forced-landed, it had found some better place than the vast Mau forest, the slopes of Kilimanjaro or the steaming elephant country to the south. I knew all the hopes. I had searched before for lost planes—and found a few.

But I did not find this one. No one ever did, though there were countless parties organized. And then, after eleven interminable days and nights, we learned by messenger that two men had crawled one morning from the rim of the Koroli Desert to the shelter of an Indian trader's camp. They were John Craig and Larry Abbot, of course—and they were nearly dead.

Men have been lost and found before—many in Africa; some in the Koroli Desert, a place of monstrous rocks burning in a sea of sand—and most times such men have a story to tell, and they tell it. These men did not. A few natives and settlers remembered seeing the plane in broad daylight and clear weather. Some said its course was erratic, its control unstable. Others said it flew straight for the desert, willfully guided there. Perhaps it does not matter, and perhaps the story of John Craig's and Larry Abbot's eleven days and nights in that prison of rock and sand does not matter either, since neither man would ever speak of it.

And yet, one wonders. I, at least, am haunted now and then by the patchwork story of the Indian trader who had nursed them, in his way, for many hours, and who seemed, when I spoke to him long afterward, an incurious man, but one of precise memory. He was a Sikh, and I remember his great turban of dirty cloth that seemed so white against his earthy skin, so fresh above his tired eyes.

"I saw them at dawn, mem-sahib," he said, "not men to the eye, but mounds of flesh for jackals. Yet they breathed, and the jackal does not touch what breathes, mem-sahib. I brought them here."

His trader's shack—his duka—was four walls of mud and daub, his merchandise the cherished luxuries and tinsel of a dozen native tribes. The men had crawled, he said, part way, and he had helped and guided them. They needed water and he had given that, and bathed their lips and burning eyes until they slept.

"Then they were not hurt," I asked, "except by the sun?"

He looked at the sun, as if to question it, and then he looked at me. "The sun, mem-sahib, may sometimes choke a man, but it leaves no mark upon his throat."

I hesitated, but he would not be hurried. "Which man?" I finally asked.

The old Sikh shrugged. He was explicit. "The mark of the big one was on the throat of the other. A strong mark, mem-sahib—a death mark, almost—but the fingers of the big one's hand were broken." He smiled musingly. "A little man can break a little bone," he said.

"I see," I told him and nodded.

So it had come to that. I wondered what had given impetus to that silent, lonely struggle in the sand. Two men—both strong, but one immense—shuffling, swaying, groping, each for the other's life. A knife against a bludgeon—the quick, sharp cleverness of Larry, the knotted muscles of Craig.

"And after that?" I turned again to the Sikh.

"There was blood on both," he said. "And this, mem-sahib, was a strange thing to my eye—that when I found them, the wounds of each were wrapped, with care, in the clothing of the other!"

I got no more from him and never will; it was all he knew. But when I left, he handed me a crumpled note in Larry's writing—a note the Sikh had picked from the floor where Craig had lain.

"I cannot read, mem-sahib. Does this have meaning?"

To me it had. It was the kind of note that was exchanged between the cockpits when the roar of the engine was too loud for speech. I read it slowly:

Better admit you can't fly, Craig—just yet, and maybe never. You're over the Koroli, and in trouble. I can take over, and I will—when you ask it. Give your pride a breather. Live and learn.

That was it—Larry, smiling still, and still sardonic, watched the little plane under Craig's thick-handed guidance plunge and

So I'm annoyed excessively
Those times you happen in and see
My hair in curlers and no make-up
Gracing the face with which I

It further burns me when you say
You really like me best this way,
For the eye that I'm the apple of
Is not completely blind with love.
And well I wot, if I should take
Your words as true, how fast you'd

FIBS? they're so easy to tell!

and so easy to use!

Women who use tampons should learn about FIBS. It's easy! Because FIBS have those smooth, gently tapered ends that tell at a glance insertion must be easy and comfortable.

FIBS are the tampons that are "quilted"—a feature fastidious women are quick to appreciate. This "quilting" prevents tiny cotton particles from clinging to delicate internal membranes.

Besides, quilting makes a very real contribution to your comfort—keeps FIBS from fluffing up to an uncomfortable size which could otherwise cause pressure, irritation, difficult removal. No other tampon is quilted!

Next time you buy tampons be sure to ask for FIBS★!

tremble over the hot, swift currents of the desert. And there was Craig, out of control, tramping the rudder bar, clutching the stick as if it were his heavy ax—and swearing to God that he would see them crash on the Koroli sand before he asked for help. And they had crashed because each must test the mettle of the other like sabers crossed in battle. Steel against steel. Pride against pride. Male against male.

And yet, in the end, as the old Sikh said: "The wounds of each were wrapped, with care, in the clothing of the other!"

Enemies—comrades for a while—but they did not become friends. It would be easier to say that whatever they had endured had bound them together and made them friends, but it wasn't so. They never spoke again—and yet they were not the same again. It was as if two disparate elements had been somehow ground in a crucible until each took essence from the other.

A little later Anne and Larry were married, and after that Anne had the child she wanted, and a certain crispness crept slowly into Larry's manner and into his life—an alertness, a sense of direction. He planned air routes and turned his dreams to money. He bought equipment and was as hard as iron in the bargaining. He gained stature; and friends who knew him for his bittersweet smile and his careless way admired him later for what they called his "drive." Success came to him, and a woman's happiness to Anne.

Craig saw her once to say good-by. His arrogance had strangely crumbled, and with it his farm. It became in time no longer the draftsman's drawing, but a warm and happily disordered place of foraging livestock and uneven fields. At last he sold it and wandered out of Africa—disconsolately, I suppose—but I had word of him.

Years later a friend from England said to me, "Do you remember Craig?" and again I saw the big man as he had once stood with his great angry ax, splitting a tree as if he were Vulcan forging armor for the gods.

"I remember Craig," I said.

"He's a doctor now," my friend said, "a surgeon in a children's clinic of the London slums."

I looked at him closely, and then I said the only thing that I could say—the only thing that would come into my mind: "A doctor? A surgeon? With those enormous hands?"

My friend nodded, smiling a little. "Yes," he said, "with those enormous hands."

THE HEART DIVIDED

"How do I know? Look—you want to see her? If you'll swear not to tell anybody, I might let you. But you've got to swear—you can swear on this stone, which is a precious stone." He pulled a small, polished bit of shining stone from his pocket. "Swear you won't tell anybody—and that you'll give me your dessert after dinner." The rider seemed an afterthought, but Eliza knew Paul.

"What is it?" she demanded.

"Oh, I don't know—apple pie, prob'ly."

She put her hand over the stone in his palm and said, "I swear," in a whisper.

Paul jumped to his feet, and they walked around the pond to the raft. They got on and paddled slowly toward the middle. Then Eliza wriggled over to the edge and got to her knees, pressing her palms down tight on the raft, and looked over into the water. Her tan-colored, somewhat lanky hair, pulled back with a narrow ribbon, fell forward on either side of her stubborn, square little face; her gray eyes were wide and intense. But all she could see was her own excited small face, with the hair falling on either side.

"That's me."

"You!" Paul said scornfully. "Can't you see the gold chain—and the tail?"

And then—then she felt the raft rocking, felt herself slipping as if Paul had pushed her, and suddenly she was in the water, splashing, struggling, terribly frightened. But Paul had grabbed her skirt and was pulling her toward the raft. She tried to put a hand on it, but it was wet and slippery. At last she climbed on, however, cold and shivering, very, very wet.

"You scared her away!" Paul said angrily.

She was rubbed down by Callie, the upstairs girl, with a huge turkish towel and dressed in a flannel sailor suit of Paul's, with the trousers turned up at the bottom, for Paul was taller than she, and then taken down in front of the fire to dry her hair. Paul had taken on the role of a modest hero. Somehow, while she was upstairs, Paul had given them the idea that it was her idea, that it was her carelessness that had caused the accident. He looked at the grownups with such a candid, wide-eyed, polite manner.

Eliza felt bitterly betrayed, and even the fact that she could see the screen did not comfort her. It was a silvery gray, and there were tree trunks on it of a deeper gray, and up the tree trunks squirrels of yet another gray were scampering. It was the wood of all woods, a secret world of its own.

Aunt Pauline was showing her mother some lengths of chintz. "All the chintzes you see here are so stupid—roses and tulips and the like," Aunt Pauline was saying. "When I saw this imported stuff at Miss Hooker's, I grabbed it. I'll ask her where she got it, if you like—you might pick up something good over there."

The chintz curtains in her mother's room had lilies on them and were new, as Aunt Pauline knew.

"I doubt if we'll buy much," her mother said. "Ned's going on business—it's not a shopping tour."

"Oh, but you're bound to buy something! I can tell you a marvelous dressmaker—not cheap, but I'm sure Ned could manage a dress or two. Her things are so awfully right. She never botches a good line with lace or ribbons or buttons."

Eliza felt a chill, like the one she had had when she got out of the water. She wanted to smile at her mother and say by the smile that the green velvet was lovely, simply exquisite, but she couldn't even look at her mother. Aunt Pauline had on a suit of speckled tweed, a plain blouse with a silver pin at the throat. She turned her head so that the fire seemed to scorch her face, and then dinner was announced.

At the table Eliza was being very silent. She was embarrassed because of having the sailor suit on, and she was hating Paul—and loving him at the same time; she was wishing her mother would be as haughtily condescending as Aunt Pauline and she was wishing her father wouldn't always agree with Uncle Robert. Then, unexpectedly, they were talking about her.

"Makes a pretty good-looking little boy," Uncle Robert was saying indulgently. "Look here, Ned, what's this about 'Liza's going to her grandmother's?"

"Julia thinks Academyville would be more fun," her father said.

Aunt Pauline gave her high, amused laugh. "Julia got away from Academyville as fast as she could!" she observed.

"Nobody there to look after 'Liza but your mother, is there?" Uncle Robert asked.

"Isn't that enough?" her mother said.

"Oh, well, seems foolish to put that responsibility on an older woman, when 'Liza'd be more than welcome here and wouldn't be any trouble at all. . . . What do you say, 'Liza? Want to stay here and cheer up your Uncle Bob?"

"Yes, darling, where would you rather stay?" Aunt Pauline said.

Eliza could not answer. She felt her heart beating hard and noisily. She looked at her father and he was looking at her with an encouraging twinkle in his dark eyes. She wanted terribly to stay here, in spite of Aunt Pauline, in spite of Paul's betrayal, in spite of everything. Then she looked at her mother. She was more beautiful than Aunt Pauline, more beautiful than Paul or any of them, but she looked outside. She looked as if she were fighting all of them.

"I'd rather go to grandmother's," Eliza lied quite clearly and calmly.

Her mother's eyes were startled and relieved and, for an instant, frightened.

Then the dessert was brought in. It was meringues filled with peach ice cream. Oh, the heavenly, sticky, crunchy chewiness of meringues! Eliza looked at them with a kind of ecstasy. Then she looked at Paul.

"Eliza looks as if she's got a fever," he said.

"I haven't," Eliza denied. "I'm cold."

And then she was curled up by the fire in the big chair and the rest were at the table, and Paul—Paul was eating her meringue.

All the way to Academyville, her mother was sharp with her. But Eliza knew she was still talking to father, through Eliza, the way she had on the way to Yew Valley, though father wasn't there with them. It wasn't anger directed at Eliza at all.

Academyville was very small. There was Main Street and, crossing it, Church Street and School Street and Mill Street. There was a little street called Railroad Street, but there was nothing on it except the railroad station and two small cottages, and there was Hill Street, where Grandmother Goodspeed lived.

NEXT MONTH

JOB TATUM stood before the fashionable congregation crowding St. Simon's on Easter morning . . . "I am the resurrection. . . ." Beautiful words, drama and power behind them, and yet Job Tatum could feel only rebellion in his heart as he spoke. Where along the way had he lost his faith? When had he ceased to be a minister of the gospel and become the glorified head of a successful corporation?

To find an answer to those questions a man would have to start at the beginning, and seek, like Nicodemus, a truth he could believe.

Dorothy Walworth has written a challenging novel of five people's search for happiness and a lasting faith.

Eliza was suddenly frightened. She had almost forgotten what Grandmother Goodspeed was like, but now, seeing her, she remembered, and she was afraid. For grandmother was stern. There was absolutely no nonsense about her. She didn't go with the yellow house, which was cheerful, even jolly-looking. She had on a gray dress, stiff with starch. Over the gray collar of the dress was fitted a narrow little tatting collar, and at the throat was a large oval pin, black around the edges but with roses painted against white enamel in the middle. She was small, but her back was as straight as a ruler.

Her mother put the suitcase down on the porch, kissed grandmother.

Grandmother said, "I've been expecting you since lunchtime."

The house had a good hot smell. The stairs were steep, heavily carpeted. Eliza's room was small, but very, very clean, and on the floor was a rug with roses in it. There was a hole cut in it near the chest for the hot-air register. Eliza went and stood on the register. The heat came up comfortingly under her short plaid skirt.

The bathroom was different from the bathroom at home. The floor was covered with linoleum, and over the linoleum were several braided rugs. In the corner was a tank with a little gas fire burning under it. Eliza thought the bathroom a very cozy place. She stayed there so long that when she came out her mother had already gone downstairs. She felt a sudden panic of desire to get to her mother, not to be left alone up here in the strangeness. Her mother was in the kitchen.

"What I don't see," grandmother was saying, "is how you can go off to Europe and leave her behind. I may be old-fashioned—I no doubt am—but I still believe a mother's place is with her children."

Then they saw her standing in the doorway and said no more of that.

"You carry these potatoes in, Eliza," grandmother said.

The dining room was small, with a window full of plants. The table was round and on it Eliza carefully placed the potatoes. They had a smell different from potatoes at home. Eliza had tried to get Mittie to fix some like them, but Mittie had just laughed at her. "You cut them with a baking-powder can," she'd tried to explain. You did too. The can seemed to have something to do with their specialness.

After they had been at the table awhile grandmother said, "You'd better run over to Cornelia's tonight if you have to start back in the morning."

"Cornelia knows I'm here, doesn't she?" Eliza's mother said slowly. "Can't she come over here?"

"She can, but I doubt if she will."

"I guess she'll have to if she wants to see me. I haven't got much time and I'd rather spend it with you."

"Sometimes I want to spank you, Julia, as if you were a little girl Eliza's size!"

"I don't think you can find any real reason why I should go to see Cornelia any more than that Cornelia should come to see me," her mother said. "Perhaps I ought to stay till Monday and take Eliza to school."

"Nonsense; she can go with the Scott girls. Of course—stay as long as you feel you can, though. Goodness knows, you get home seldom enough."

"As often as you get to see me, mother."

"Old people ought never to go visiting, I've always said. They don't fit in and they get to feeling sorry for themselves. I made up my mind long ago that I'd never let myself in for that. I like being independent."

"No one's trying to take your independence away from you."

"It gets taken away when you leave your own things and ways," grandmother said. "What grade are you in, Eliza?"

"Fourth," Eliza said.

"That's real good for nine."

Eliza dried the dishes. She worked slowly, afraid she might drop something, afraid the glasses might not shine enough, afraid grandmother would turn her stern eyes on her accusingly.

After the dishes were done, they all sat in the sitting room for a while. It was all quite calm and pleasant there by the funny square stove with the little windows in the front through which you could see the flames licking up and up, thin and blue. It made you sleepy, watching the fire.

It was when she got upstairs and was undressing that Eliza suddenly felt terribly homesick and frightened. Over the bureau was a picture of three horses' heads, wild-eyed, with manes flowing. All her insides felt queer and shaky. She thought she was going to be sick to her stomach and knew she should go down the hall to the bathroom, just in case, but for some reason the thought of the hall terrified her. She didn't dare go out through the door.

Then her mother came in and everything settled down again. "Cleaned your teeth?"

"Yes," Eliza lied. She couldn't go away from her mother, not right now. Afterward she'd undo the lie and go and clean her teeth. But not now.

She crept into bed quickly, and her mother came and sat on the edge. "You'll write to mother often, won't you, pet? Mother'll want to know everything that happens, about school and the girls you like and everything. You'll have fun, darling. Would you rather I waited and went to school with you the first day?"

"No, you don't have to," Eliza said.

"I could, you know, but there are so many things to do before we sail. Your daddy needs me there to help him. He never wants me away."

That's kind of a lie, Eliza thought, and felt better about the teeth lie. She didn't believe her father really needed her mother there.

Then her mother said in a voice that had a little rush of shame and real worry in it, "Listen, Eliza: if you don't like it here—if it doesn't turn out to be fun—you don't have to stay, you know. You can always go to Aunt Pauline's. All you have to do is to write her a letter and someone will come and get you."

"I'll be all right," Eliza said, remembering Paul's beautiful face and the screen and the wide stretches of land where you could run and the big, lovely house and the candles on the table and all the silverware.

"Well, it's up to you, darling. You can always change your mind."

"I'd rather stay here," Eliza said in the same stubborn little voice. Her small body felt all one lump of sorrow.

"You really would, wouldn't you? Daddy seemed to think I was making you do something you didn't want to. But you did choose to come here, didn't you?"

"Yes."

"But you're still free to do whatever you want to. If you ever want to change, you can."

That quietness and sadness was in her mother's face again and Eliza felt she could not bear it. Eliza knew quite well her mother did not want her to change, that this offer was made through a kind of remorse, but she was grateful for it, all the same.

"I like it here," she insisted.

Her mother reached down and lifted her up into her arms and kissed her. Eliza felt a wetness on her face, though she wasn't crying. "I put too much on you, darling," her mother whispered. "Good night, my precious. I hate to leave you behind, but I have to, you see. I have to."

And then Eliza was alone in the little room. The light was out and her mother, in her tweed suit with the yellow scarf at her throat, was gone. Eliza curled up into a tight little ball under the quilts. She felt awful, just awful. She knew she had promised herself to go now and clean her teeth, but she couldn't make herself get out from the round little place she had made for herself under the quilts. She lay there, very tight and lonely, for a long time. Then she heard voices down below and she remembered how, the last time she had been here, she had lain on the floor and listened through the register and how funny it had been. She crept out of bed, dropped down on the floor in a sudden passion of anxiety to hear her mother's voice again.

"I thought she'd be happier here," her mother was saying, "but if you don't want her, don't beat around the bush about it."

"I never said I didn't want her. She seems a nice biddable child and we'll get along all right. It's you I'm talking about. Even if you don't feel any responsibility for your child, I should think you'd have more pride."

"Pride!" her mother said hotly.

"Yes. And don't get so highty-tighty, Julia. I'm an old woman, but I'm not a fool. I'm sorry it's turned out this way, though I can't see how you thought it would turn out any other way."

"Do you know what you're talking about, mother? I'm sure I don't."

"I'm talking about you and Ned. As you know very well. I saw how things were going a year and more ago. I didn't say anything then because I've never been one for interfering between a man and his wife—but I feel as if someone's got to give you a talking to. If you want to hang onto Ned—and why you do, I don't know, for all he's a good provider—you oughtn't to try so hard. It's just too plain that you're hanging on, Julia—that's what I mean when I say you ought to have more pride. Why don't you let him go to Europe if he's a mind to? Maybe he'd wake up a little when he found out you could be content without him."

"That's enough, mother. I don't know wherever you got the idea that Ned and I weren't happy—unless it was from wishing we wouldn't be. We couldn't be happier, as a matter of fact. I'm going to Europe because we don't want to be apart. Eliza won't miss us as much as we'd miss each other."

"Fiddlesticks! You show your pride in the wrong place."

"If you're thinking of Jeanne Benson, you've got it all wrong. That's just the way people in our crowd talk and act."

"I'd be ashamed to admit it. There were others besides the Benson woman."

"If you weren't such a good Methodist I'd think you were advocating divorce."

"I'm advocating nothing of the kind. I'm just advising you to act a little more seemly."

Eliza's mother laughed, but it was a pretend laugh. It wasn't happy. "I'm afraid you'll have to let me behave as I see fit," she said. "But you can put your mind at rest about Ned and me—we love each other, you know. Even if we did marry in a hurry—even if he is a Griggs and I'm a Goodspeed from Academyville. Pauline would like to agree with you, but Ned and I are the ones to know, I should think."

Grandmother got up from her chair and came over to the stove, shook down the ashes, turned the damper in the stovepipe. Eliza trembled a little, wriggling back from the register, as if they could see her looking down. She got to her feet, went softly down the hall to the bathroom and scrubbed her teeth very, very thoroughly.

In the morning her mother was gone. Without any other good-by than the kiss of last night. Just gone. Eliza felt that she half understood and at the same time half of her passionately protested.

"They have Sunday school before church now," grandmother said. "So you get through with your breakfast and get yourself ready, Eliza."

"All right, grandmother."

"Just plain 'grandma' is enough, dear."

Oh, the hairline tightrope of loyalty on which a child must walk, a child like Eliza Griggs, born with that sight which takes in both sides of a coin at once. Oh, dreadful winter, when you perform on that tightrope for strangers day in, day out. Oh, homesickness so all-encompassing that you feel like nothingness inside your warm blue coat as you climb the hill to school, like dying. Oh, dreadful, dreadful winter.

It was not only grandma who was the audience. There were Aunt Cornelia and Uncle Will. There were the boys and girls at school and in Sunday school.

"Isn't Aunt Cornelia mother's sister?" she asked grandma and grandma said:

"Yes—her half sister."

"What's a half sister?"

"Her father wasn't your mother's father."

"Oh," Eliza said doubtfully.

Before ever she went to Aunt Cornelia's, she was prejudiced against her, because of mother's refusal to go see her that Saturday when they'd come here. It seemed very queer that you wouldn't go to see your own sister. When she saw Aunt Cornelia she hated her, just hated her. She looked a little like mother, only not so beautiful. And not so gay. She had grandma's straight back and grandma's sternness and she never laughed. She had a nice house on Mill Street where you could see the creek and there were willow trees, three huge ones, on the creek bank across from the house.

Eliza went there first with a bowl of plum jelly. She carried it down the hill to Mill Street, down Mill Street to the little white house with petunias still blossoming around the low white porch, set it on the step before she knocked, as grandma had told her to do.

"I've brought you some jelly," she said.

"Oh," Aunt Cornelia said. "Bring it in, dear."

She didn't want Aunt Cornelia, who wouldn't come to see mother, to call her "dear."

"If you'll excuse me while I finish getting the curtains up ——" Aunt Cornelia said in a polite but not really friendly voice.

Eliza hardly knew whether to go or stay. She stayed, sitting stiffly in a straight chair and watching Aunt Cornelia running the curtains onto the rods. "Why don't you have curtains on top too?" Eliza asked.

"Draperies?" Aunt Cornelia said. "They aren't suitable in this house."

"Aunt Pauline has beautiful curtains," Eliza offered. "They came from France, from Paris, France. They're exquisite."

"I dare say," Aunt Cornelia said dryly.

"Did you ever go to my Aunt Pauline's house?"

"No, I never did."

"Aunt Pauline's house is exquisite, simply exquisite," Eliza said in an affected voice. "It's like a—a castle."

"Well, some like castles and some like cottages," Aunt Cornelia said in a voice that was half angry.

Just then Uncle Will came in. Uncle Will ran the feed-and-flour mill on Main Street. He was a short and sturdy man, not fat, with nice, twinkling eyes, and Eliza liked him. He had on overalls and a blue shirt, rolled up above the elbows. He looked a little dusty with flour all over. He had very thick brown hair and that looked dusty too.

"Hi, peanut!" he said, grinning at her. "When are you coming in and grind a bag of flour for me?"

For just an instant Eliza was a little girl again; she could relax into a world where grownups let you do wonderful things just because you were little, where you only had to pretend in the manner of childhood. "Maybe Saturday—if grandma will let me!" she said a little breathlessly.

"I'll speak to grandma. I need an assistant."

"I've just swept in here—you'd better go brush yourself off," Aunt Cornelia said sharply.

Uncle Will gave her a look. It was a look that laughed at her, yet was sad too. It reminded Eliza somehow of her father, though Uncle Will was certainly nothing like him. "Pernickety!" he explained Aunt Cornelia to Eliza.

For some reason Aunt Cornelia reddened. But she didn't say anything, and Uncle Will went out to the little room off the kitchen and Eliza could hear him brushing away out there, whistling to himself as he did so.

"I guess I'd better go now," Eliza said.

Aunt Cornelia went out to the dining room and took a plant from the shelf by the windows. "Could you carry this to grandma?" she asked. "She's been wanting some baby tears." Eliza felt a quick delight in the name. It was just exactly right for the vine that sprawled over the little crock, for the tiny, tiny leaves. Then Aunt Cornelia seemed to hesitate. She picked up a very tiny pot with a stiff little plant that had only two small branches like a tree and a few fat leaves. "This is for you. It is a jade tree," Aunt Cornelia said stiffly.

"Thank you," Eliza said, not wanting to take the gift, but taking it.

"Good-by, Eliza."

The jade tree bothered Eliza. She didn't like Aunt Cornelia and she didn't think Aunt Cornelia liked her. But there was something about the little tree that fascinated her. It excited her to have it; yet she knew it was not fitting that Aunt Cornelia, not liking her, should have given her a present.

As a matter of fact, no one seemed to like Eliza very much. Not Mary Scott, who generally walked to school with her, not her classmates, not her teachers, not Aunt Cornelia. She bragged too much, for one thing. She knew very well that bragging was neither dignified nor endearing. It was just that she did not know, any more than her mother did, how to establish her own personality in the eyes of others. She knew what she was like inside, she knew she was smart and pretty enough, but she never felt that anyone else recognized her as real at all. So she bragged. She emphasized her urban differences. She used words that Paul or Aunt Pauline used. When a letter came from her mother, she would take it to school and use it as a bookmark, letting the foreign stamp show to impress the boy or girl next to her. That no one liked her she knew and wept over in the night.

Yet there were things she liked. She liked the smell of grandma's house. It smelled warm and clean, and the cooking smell was good there too. There was the smell of chili sauce and molasses cookies and apples and baked potatoes. She liked walking to school alone, especially while the leaves were still underfoot and she could see leaf prints on the walk and frost across the rector's lawn to the line where the sun had begun to strike. She liked sitting in church with grandma after the ordeal of Sunday school, hearing the rumbling of grand Biblical phrases from the pulpit and watching the light through the colored windows. She liked reading the books in grandma's bookcase. She read Ivanhoe and Vanity Fair and

The Hunchback of Notre Dame and found them all exciting. But over and above and below and around all these likes was the homesickness, the longing for her mother, the feeling of desperate necessity to be with her mother and look after her, the longing for Paul.

She was what grandma called "biddable." She did everything grandma told her to, but time went terribly slowly.

One day Mary Scott came over to play. Grandma approved of Mary Scott and had asked her herself. Eliza never asked any of the girls to come see her.

Grandma gave them a plate of cookies and apples and said, "Maybe you'd like to dress up? I used to like to when I was your age. There are some old dresses in the brown trunk in the attic, and if you'll spread papers on the floor and put everything back afterward, you may try them on."

Eliza had never been in the attic before. There was no light but that which came through the small dormer windows. They spread out the newspapers on the floor and Mary ran to the trunks and opened one.

"Oh-h-h!" she cried softly, ecstatically.

Eliza followed her, not quite sure whether to give herself up to this make-believe or to hold herself aloof from it. But in the depths of the trunk lay something so beautiful that Eliza could not resist it. It was a wedding dress of satin, with tissue between its folds and a veil like a cloud beside it. "Oh-h-h!" the breathed an echo of Mary's cry.

Eliza got out of her plain skirt and white blouse with the ruffled collar, lifted the beautiful thing out of the trunk. She might have many beautiful dresses in the years to come, but never again would she feel quite the sensuous delight of that satin dress on her slight young body, the thick folds billowing about her, the train swirling on the floor, the filmy dream of a veil spread out to infinity on every side. No one was ever so beautiful as Eliza felt herself to be there in the chilly attic, with Mary's wide eyes on her affirming her beauty.

"I'm Queen Guinevere!" Eliza said. "You have to bow down to me and kiss my hand."

And Mary would have done it, too, had it not been that at that moment grandma's brisk little steps came up the attic stairs and grandma called out, "Did you find the dresses, girls?" Eliza turned, still Queen Guinevere, and grandma said in a different voice, tight and angry, "Where did you get that dress? Take it off at once, Eliza. I said the brown trunk!"

It was plain enough to see now that the trunk was black. Eliza, the magic gone, got out of the satin dress and stood there in her little cotton slip.

"Were you married in it, Mrs. Goodspeed?" Mary asked.

"No," grandma said shortly. "It belonged to Eliza's mother." She put the dress away, closed the lid. Then she said, "It's pretty cold up here—you'd better bring some things down to Eliza's room." She opened the brown trunk, took out an armful of dresses and led the way down the steep stairs into Eliza's room. "There—you'll be more comfortable down here," she said, and left them to their play.

They dressed up, but anything was bound to be an anticlimax after the wonder of the wedding dress. Besides, Eliza had something on her mind and she couldn't throw herself into pretending. It was not her mother's wedding dress. She knew it was not because once she had asked her mother about her wedding dress and her mother had laughed and said, "Darling, I was married in a green suit at a justice's—I wasn't married in a church at all. But it was binding, darling." So grandma had lied. But that didn't make sense, for grandma just couldn't lie. You couldn't, even if you wanted to, believe that grandma could lie.

At supper Eliza said suddenly, "Why did you say that was mother's wedding dress?"

Grandma looked up quickly. "Because it was," she answered shortly.

"Mother had a green suit when she was married," Eliza insisted.

Grandma gave a funny little sigh, put down her fork and looked at Eliza sternly. "Your mother didn't see fit to wear the dress. Nevertheless, it was hers."

"Why didn't she wear it?"

"She changed her plans. . . . Eat your supper, child, it's getting cold."

So she had that mystery to mull over. It was exciting, in a way, but it was more a weight than a joy. She just couldn't see how mother or anyone could have worn a green suit instead of the satin dress.

One Sunday afternoon she looked at old family pictures. There were lots of mother. Mother when she was about sixteen, always laughing. Then mother with a man.

"Grandma—is that Uncle Will?"

"Yes, child," grandma said.

Uncle Will was in almost every picture with mother. He had on regular clothes and didn't look dusty as he did in the mill. There weren't any pictures of Aunt Cornelia with Uncle Will. But mother sat in a canoe with him, she rode some old spotted farm horses with him, she played tennis with him. Once he had his arm about her shoulders.

"Why did mother always have her picture taken with Uncle Will?"

"They were friends."

"I should think he'd have had his picture taken with Aunt Cornelia."

"Oh, that was long before he married your Aunt Cornelia."

Once grandma said to her, "Would you like to have a party, Eliza?" Grandma looked at her in a worried way, as if she feared she weren't having a good time.

"No, I guess not."

"You don't seem to play much. You're quite welcome to have your friends here, you know, dear."

---

Always listen to the opinions of others; it probably won't do you any good, but it will them.

Speak well of your enemies. Remember you made them.

---

Eliza was too proud to say she didn't have any real friends in Academyville. "I'd rather read than play," she said.

"You'll ruin your eyes. You ought to be outdoors more. Why don't you run over to Mary's till supper's ready?"

"Oh, Mary's such a baby, grandma!"

Mary did seem like a baby. Most of the children did, compared with Paul. And yet Eliza longed to be accepted by these babies, longed for their approval.

Once she overheard grandma and Aunt Cornelia talking about her. "I declare, I worry about the child," grandma said. "She doesn't eat half enough—picks at her food like a bird. I think she's lonesome, as well she might be, cooped up with an old woman. But she doesn't make any effort to have friends."

"She never will have friends," Aunt Cornelia said. "She wants people to dislike her."

"Cornelia! What a ridiculous thing to say!"

"Well, it's true. I don't know why it's true, but it is. She always knows exactly what she's doing. Oh, I know what you're thinking, mother—but it isn't so. It isn't on account of Julia I dislike her. It's Eliza herself. She isn't like a child at all—she's like a grownup. She looks at you like a grownup and tries to ape grownup talk. I pity her a little, but I can't like her."

"Shame on you!"

"Yes, I'm ashamed of it," Aunt Cornelia said, and her voice was suddenly lost and lonely and Eliza, listening at the register, felt a quick kinship with that voice. In that moment she didn't hate Aunt Cornelia at all, no matter if she was saying these awful things about her, Eliza.

There was a small silence down below and then grandma said, "Julia ought never to have left her behind."

Aunt Cornelia did not answer that. The silence was very long below, somehow more frightening than the discussion. Then Aunt Cornelia was putting her coat on, the front door was closing, grandma was shaking the sitting-room stove. Eliza crept back into bed.

In the night she had a dream, a nightmare of a dream. She was running across a moor. The ground was bumpy but there were no trees. The air was gray, a not-quite-night gray. Paul was running just ahead of her and he never stumbled, just ran on, swift as a bird. Behind them the three horses, snorting, with manes flying, came galloping. They were enormous and she and Paul were very small and the moor stretched out and out, never ending. You couldn't stop, or the horses would be upon you. "Paul—Paul! Wait for me!" she kept calling, but her voice was too little and Paul couldn't possibly hear it, she knew. She woke up and she was crying, crying terribly hard, and grandma was sitting on the edge of her bed and she was gathering Eliza up into her arms, saying, "There, there, child! There, there! Don't cry, child! Grandma's here!" And she rocked back and forth a little, holding Eliza close to her. She smelled nice, like the little satin bags of sachet in her bureau drawers.

"I had a bad dream," Eliza murmured.

"I KNOW. It's all right now, though. You're awake and grandma's here!" Her voice was nice, warm and loving and nice. "You cuddle down now and grandma'll bring you some good hot milk." Grandma's slippered feet went down the stairs, came up again. "Here, Eliza—drink this, dear."

The hot milk was warm all the way down. Eliza had a queer feeling of utter happiness there in the night. She felt taken care of, a little girl loved and taken care of, with no problems, no mysteries. She curled up under the warm quilts, closed her eyes. Grandma sat there, smoothing back her hair. She fell asleep.

It was only a few days after that when Eliza spent a day and a night in Aunt Cornelia's house. When she came down to breakfast on that morning, grandma was dressed to go out.

"Mrs. Peabody has been taken bad and she wants me to come up," grandma said. "You're to go over to Aunt Cornelia's for lunch, Eliza, and to stay overnight."

So she went, reluctantly, carrying her pajamas and clean blouse in a paper sack, to Aunt Cornelia's house.

Lunch wasn't bad, because Uncle Will was there, joking in his quiet way, giving her the biggest portions of everything; and at supper there was a hickory-nut cake. There never was such a delicious cake, never.

After supper and the dishes, Uncle Will began to cut away at a piece of wood: a deer for Eliza.

"My father can make things out of clay," Eliza said.

"Can he, now? Well, I never tried to do that."

Aunt Cornelia came to the door and said, "Will, aren't you going to the trustees' meeting at the church?"

"Guess not," Uncle Will said. "'Tisn't often we have a little girl spend the evening with us."

"Not Julia's little girl, anyway," Aunt Cornelia said. Her voice sounded as if she hated them, both of them.

But all Uncle Will said was, "No, not Julia's little girl," in a very quiet voice, and went to work again.

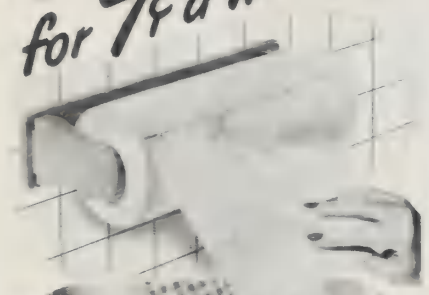
After that Aunt Cornelia never said a word.

It was Uncle Will who finally said, quite gently, "I guess it's bedtime."

Eliza looked up, keeping her eyes pushed wide open against sleep. The little deer was almost done. It was beautiful. "What did you do with the spotted horse?" she asked.

"The spotted horse?" Uncle Will said, looking up at her in a surprised way.

"In the album. You and mother rode on the spotted horses."



Uncle Will looked toward the sitting room. His face got all tired and sad. "Oh, yes," he said. "No, those weren't my horses. They belonged to John Stacy, up Minnow Run. . . . Better run up to bed now. I'll have this all done for you in the morning."

"It's nice," Eliza said.

In the night something happened, something that seemed like a dream in the morning, but which wasn't a dream. It was Aunt Cornelia. "Get up, Eliza," she said. "Here; wrap this blanket round your shoulders. Come over by the window."

Dazed, half frightened, Eliza did as she was told, went over to the window. Across the creek she saw three great willow trees and they were covered with ice; every fine, sweeping, slender branch was silver. Three magic trees, more beautiful than anything Eliza had ever seen in her life.

"And that, Eliza, is exquisite," Aunt Cornelia said suddenly in a sharp, unfriendly voice. "Get back to bed now." And without another word, she went out of the room.

And there Eliza was, back in bed, weighing the gift of the trees against the motive which had prompted the gift, and she was confused and troubled. She knew very well that she had behaved like a show-off, forever saying this or that was "exquisite," talking in a haughty voice with the r's off, like Aunt Pauline, bragging about her possessions. And yet she had at the same time a feeling that if somebody liked her, he'd know she wasn't like that inside. He'd know she had to be that way, to show that she was here under protest, just because her mother'd wanted her to be here. He'd know that she behaved like this because it was the way her mother had to behave. But why did mother act like that? Why was she always fighting? Why did father always act as if he had to hurt her? Why hadn't mother worn the wedding dress? Why was even grandma against mother? Why was Aunt Cornelia against mother? . . . Then through all the why's came the wonder, the miracle of the trees. No matter why Aunt Cornelia had shown her the trees, she had shown her them. She forgave Aunt Cornelia, not quite understanding why she forgave her, but in reality because Aunt Cornelia had truly understood that the trees were the very essence of enchantment and beauty. There was something in Aunt Cornelia that was kin to something in Eliza.

Eliza never said anything was "exquisite" ever again.

One day Mary Scott said to her on the way home from school. "I know something about your mother." Mary had a sly, insinuating voice.

"You do not," Eliza said flatly. "You never saw her."

"I did, too, see her, and I do, too, know something!"

"Well, what?" Eliza demanded, unable to hold back the question.

"She ran away—right on her wedding day!"

"She did not," Eliza said.

"She did so. My mother said so. She was going to marry Will Dennison—and she ran away and married somebody else. And everybody was at the church and had to go home. And Will was made a fool of, right in front of the whole town, my mother said. And I guess my mother knows, because she was there—and she said she guessed your mother'd found out it wasn't such an easy bed to lie in after all. . . . Who are you going to marry?"

"I'm not going to marry anybody," Eliza said. "And that's all a lie about my mother."

"It is not. You're a liar if you say it is. I guess my mother knows. . . . You have to marry somebody. I'm going to marry Johnny Peters."

"You don't have to."

"You do too. You can't have a house and babies and things if you don't."

"Well, you could live in a hotel, I guess. You don't have to have babies if you don't want to. I'm going to be an actress and I'm not going to marry anybody."

That night she wrote a letter to Aunt Pauline.

Dear Aunt Pauline: Can I come and stay with you till mother gets back? I don't like it here. Please let me come. I won't be any bother.

Lovingly,
ELIZA.

But she didn't send it. She kept it in the red box, in case, just in case she couldn't stand Academyville any longer. She knew it would be giving in if she sent it.

In March there was another strange and very terrible happening.

"Aunt Cornelia has a loaf of brown bread for us. Suppose you stop after school and get it, Eliza," grandma said.

That was how it chanced that Eliza was there. She had the bread and was about to leave when there was this sound of steps, heavy steps of several people, on the porch, and then the door opened without any knocking and Jerry, the helper at the mill, and Mr. Hall, the butcher, came in, half carrying Uncle Will. The first thing Eliza saw was the blood. Blood was dripping over everything: on the beautiful hooked rug with the maple leaves all over it that lay in the hall, on the painted floor around it, on Uncle Will's dusty overalls.

"In here," Aunt Cornelia said. She was white as chalk. She led the way into the living room and Jerry and Mr. Hall put Uncle Will on the couch.

"I'll go see if I can hurry up doc," Jerry said.

"Yes, hurry," Aunt Cornelia said.

So the two men went out, as if glad to get away from the trouble. Then Aunt Cornelia went down all of a sudden on her knees beside the couch, put her face against Uncle Will's.

"Oh, Will! Oh, Will!" she cried.

"Don't worry," Uncle Will said in a whispery kind of voice.

"Oh, Will—I love you so!" Aunt Cornelia said. "I love you so."

"Good. That's good," Uncle Will said in that faint, far-off way.

"Careless—just carelessness," Uncle Will said almost crossly. Then he shut his eyes and Eliza saw that Aunt Cornelia was crying. It was shocking to see Aunt Cornelia cry. She seemed like someone too strong for tears.

Then the doctor was there, taking Aunt Cornelia out into the hall, and Eliza heard her say "Off?" in a frozen way.

Uncle Will's hand was taken off—off. That was to be a horror to Eliza forever, but it was not the first thing she remembered about that awful day. The first thing was Aunt Cornelia's voice saying, "I love you so—I love you so!" Saying it so that no one could ever have doubted that she meant it. And so the mystery about men and women deepened, the puzzle grew more complex. Aunt Cornelia was cross and cold. She acted as if she didn't like Uncle Will. But she loved him.

Eliza grew taller and thinner that spring. Her square little face seemed to lengthen and her eyes grow bigger.

Twice she went up on the hill and got hepaticas that grew in the thick dead leaves along the ravine bank. She put one in a letter to her mother, after she had pressed it flat in the big dictionary overnight. It got somehow to be May and people stopped talking about Uncle Will's accident. In June mother would be back.

On the fifteenth of May Eliza got two letters from the post office after school. One was to grandma and one was to Eliza. Eliza waited till she was up in her own room with the door shut before she read hers.

Darling: It's hard for mother to write this, but you are a big girl now and I think you will understand. You know that sometimes fathers and mothers aren't very happy together and that then they decide not to live together any longer. Mother and daddy have decided they are like that. Daddy is coming home soon, but mother is going to stay over here, because it is cheaper to live here and because there are more friends here. Daddy will come and get you as soon as school is out. Mother will miss you terribly much, darling, but she wants you to stay with daddy and look out for him and love him. Sometime you will come over and visit me here. I promise you. Be good, my sweet little girl.

All my love,
MOTHER.

Grandma sat up late that night writing a letter to mother, but nothing happened. No miracle intervened and canceled out the facts.

On the twelfth of June father came, looking very handsome, a little embarrassed, a little truculent, and took her away. Grandma gave him what she called "a piece of her mind," but father got more like himself then, answering her politely but curtly too.

"I'm afraid it's our affair," he said. He almost ignored grandma's suggestion that Eliza stay there for the summer. "Eliza will be well cared for," he said coldly.

Aunt Cornelia came over to say good-by. Uncle Will had said good-by the night before. Eliza's suitcases were down in the hall, the car was waiting before the gate.

Suddenly Eliza said, "Wait!" and ran upstairs and came down carrying the little jade tree. And then she saw Aunt Cornelia standing there in the hall looking at her in the oddest way, as if there were some bond between them, but one unnamable. "And thank you for the jade tree, Aunt Cornelia," was all she could say.

"All right, Eliza—jump in!" father said.

She looked back and grandma and Aunt Cornelia stood on the steps of the yellow house, watching them drive away.

"Good-by!" Eliza called quickly. But they were off in a sudden rush and she didn't know whether the word got back to them or not or whether they had answered.

II

ELIZA GRIGGS sat in the red leather chair by the window in the seminar room. There was no seminar going on. There was only Miss Elmslie sitting at the end of the long table, turned away, with Eliza's last themes for English strewn on the table close to her hand. It was a pleasant room with long windows looking out on the spring green of the campus. Miss Elmslie's face was anxious and a little tired. She was not only Eliza's English teacher, but also her Senior Adviser. They looked calm and quiet enough, the two of them, a tall student and a teacher with a serene face—except for those anxious eyes—sitting and talking over a term's work. Neither one was actually calm.

"You're not pleased?" Miss Elmslie said after a long silence.

"Why, I don't know," said Eliza. "It's just—comparative. There isn't much to choose from."

Miss Elmslie flushed. "You think yourself ready to compete with Faulkner and Wolfe and Mann?"

"No, of course not. But I'd rather than to compete with Pat and Virginia and the rest."

"Naturally, you want to aim high. It might surprise you to know, Eliza, that not everyone voted for you." She reached out a hand, picked up one of the papers. "Here you have a tale—dramatically told, I grant you—of a miner imprisoned underground after an explosion. I feel reasonably sure you have never been in a mine, have never experienced anything like the agony of a leg being cut off. It is like a trick, your writing of such things. It is nothing of you, of your own world."

Eliza turned and gave Miss Elmslie the direct look that had embarrassed teachers and companions for some years now. It was not rude, it was just very direct. "How do you know?" she asked.

"Well, have you ever been imprisoned in a mine?"

"Yes," Eliza said. Then she smiled, in an adult, almost amused fashion, and said, "Not in a coal mine, of course."

Miss Elmslie hesitated. She was truly interested in her students; she was sensitive; she did not like quarreling. Sighing, she put the theme down on the table again. "What are you planning to do this summer, Eliza?" she asked unexpectedly.

Eliza Griggs moved toward the window and stood there with one hand on the blue curtains. She had a look of flight all through her tall, slender young body, and into her somewhat haughty face sprang an incredibly sweet and radiant look of expectation.

"I'll be visiting my mother this summer," Eliza said in a movingly young, ecstatic voice. "In France."

"But how wonderful for you!" Miss Elmslie said sincerely.

These girls, to an outsider, would have looked much alike. Eliza was dressed like them all: scuffed brown-and-white shoes, a gray-and-blue plaid skirt, white Angora sweater with sleeves pushed up above her elbows, a blue ribbon around her hair. But to Miss Elmslie, sitting there, troubled and more inarticulate than was common to her, she was like no one she had ever had in her classes before. A top-ranking student, but one who cared little whether she was top-ranking or not; a girl with talent, but one who scorned the chief literary honor given to seniors; a girl who generally conformed, but who broke rules without compunction when it suited her to do so. Looking at her, standing there by the window as if her spirit had left her body and were already winging to France, Miss Elmslie did not know how to say what she was forced to say.

"Eliza," Miss Elmslie said slowly, "there's something I have to discuss with you."

Eliza came back to the red chair, sat down again and waited inquiringly.

"It seems that you have asked for three home leaves this last month," Miss Elmslie began. "Yet it has come to Miss Truscott's knowledge that you have not been home. It is distasteful to me to pry, but I have to ask where you have spent your week ends."

"At the bay," Eliza said.

"Were you visiting someone at the bay?"

"No."

"May I ask where you stayed?"

"At my Aunt Pauline's cottage."

"Oh. Was she there?"

"No."

"Please, Eliza—I don't like to do this, you know. I know how much privacy means. I've never had a great deal of my own, so I value it too. But the truth is, Miss Truscott saw you and a young man in the Stamford Station a week ago Sunday night and he was kissing you good-by. Miss Truscott fears you have been spending your week ends with this young man."

Eliza studied the toes of her saddle shoes for some time, then lifted her eyes to Miss Elmslie's waiting, sternly embarrassed face. "It was my Cousin Paul," she said in that disturbingly clear voice.

"Your cousin?"

"Yes, my Cousin Paul. The families are always there in the summer. We like to go sailing before anyone's there. Don't you ever get tired of people, Miss Elmslie, of all us girls, and the other teachers?"

Miss Elmslie flushed. "Yes, sometimes," she admitted. "Sometimes I do. But we cannot overlook either your deception as to your destination or the fact that you are spending your time with a young man, cousin or no. How old is he?"

"Almost nineteen."

"Do his parents know he goes to the bay?"

"No."

Miss Elmslie felt a kind of sickness. In Eliza's bluntness, in her refusal to qualify, to explain, to excuse, there was a kind of appeal that Miss Elmslie felt a response to. "I understand, Eliza. But I am afraid, for the sake of your standing in the school, that I shall have to ask you to assure me that you won't go again." She stood up and so did Eliza. The interview was over.

Eliza moved into the corridor. At the door she turned and looked straight at Miss Elmslie and said, "I might have to go."

In the morning when Miss Elmslie went out to take the mail from the mailman, she saw a girl come out of the dormitory carrying a small bag like a duffel bag. She made no pretense of evasion, walked erectly down the drive and into the road that led to the highway. It was Eliza Griggs. Miss Elmslie stood there, shocked into utter stillness, staring after her. After several minutes, she went back into the building and looked at the book where leaves were entered. There was no signature of Eliza Griggs there.

At half past two o'clock that afternoon, Eliza dropped the duffel bag in the cottage at the bay. It was empty and her steps across the floor sounded loud and lonely. For an instant she had a fright—not of being alone in the house, but at a sudden certainty that Paul wouldn't come. It was a fright she had experienced many times. Paul never liked to be the first one anywhere. He liked fires to be laid, food cooked, gaiety established before he arrived.

She went into Aunt Pauline's bedroom, took slacks from her bag, and sneakers, got into them, pulled a white sweater of Paul's over her head. Then she ran out through the hallway to the back shed where kindling and wood were piled. She carried paper and kindling into the living room, fetched three great logs. As soon as the first fire showed, she was sure of Paul again. Warm and sure. It was always this way. The fear, really intense and horrible, that he wouldn't come—then the surety the fire brought.

Her wrist watch was on the wrist raised to the mantel. She would not look at it. If you looked, only two or three minutes would have gone when you had thought it would be at least fifteen. She tried to think of something. She thought about yesterday and the talk with Miss Elmslie.

Oh, how do you know, she continued the conversation passionately, what I have experienced and what I have not? I have been imprisoned for a long, long time. I know all about it. No one could know it better than I, the feeling of prison. No, I haven't ever had a leg cut off, but I know what it is like. It is not so bad as having your heart cut out, little by little. It is not so bad as that. But now the time is almost gone and I am going to my mother. Do you think I would have stayed here at school if I hadn't had that ahead? And what do you think I would have done without Paul all these years? There has to be a place, one place, where you can be yourself, where you don't feel hurt and old all the time. Maybe that is love—but it hasn't anything to do with sex, not anything at all. He's just my Cousin Paul and he can—can make magic. He's cruel sometimes, but he can make magic. Everything seems more exciting, more possible when you're with him. Then you know you don't have to stay forever with dad and Stella. You know that you can go, can get away, that you will get away. You see, I just walked out of school—nothing stopped me. I saw you standing there, but you didn't stop me. No one can, if you just make up your mind. And no one can stop me going this summer, either.

Suddenly she heard, far up the shore road, the sound of a car coming very fast. She never doubted that it was Paul. No one but Paul would so swoop along the shore road. The car stopped with a noisy jerk in the sandy road beside the cottage.

Then Paul opened the cottage door, not hurriedly, but as if he'd been not long away, and she turned and said, "Oh, hello. So you made it, after all?" Quite as if she'd half expected he wouldn't.

"Much as ever," he said. He had a very Boston way of talking, almost British. In another she might have found it affected—in Paul it seemed just right. "What a day! You know, Eliza"—he always pronounced it Ayleeza, though no one else did—"there's something rather horrible about bloodsuckers. But they'll feed on each other tonight, not on me. They've been after me to join this so-called literary club. So I just told them to come around to my place tonight. Well, there they'll be, I hope, and they can wait. They won't have anything to say, because they need somebody to supply the ideas." He gave a clear laugh, throwing back his head. "Funny, don't you think?"

"Sounds pathetic to me," Eliza said.

"Pathetic? Don't be silly!"

He followed her out to the kitchen and stood smoking, while she fixed some salmon in a brown baking dish, put it into the oven.

"I'll make the toast and coffee," he said.

"Not yet. It'll take a while for the salmon."

"Let's go down and see the boat."

They walked quickly down the sandy road to the pier. There she lay, trim and white, the Akhnaten, her name standing out clearly in a beautiful, clear light blue.

"Seems to be all right. Thought the storm last week might have banged her up a bit." For an instant his voice was quite without affectation. Just the voice of a boy who loved his boat. Eliza felt suddenly wildly happy, happy enough to cry.

They stood there for several minutes in silence, just looking at the boat and the quiet bay. Then they turned and began to walk slowly back to the house.

They went into the house and to the kitchen. Paul began at once to make coffee. Then he took bread and the long toasting fork in by the fire while Eliza set up a table in there near him, put a bright cloth on it, silver and dishes, opened the pickles and the plums, put butter on plates. She carried in the dish of salmon and they sat there in the spring twilight.

"Out of bounds!" Paul said suddenly and scornfully. "That's what I want put on my tombstone: 'He lived out of bounds.'"

"I don't believe you can," she said.

"Oh, but I can! I will. I do. I'm living there right now."

I feel as if I might never be as happy as this ever again, Eliza thought. School seemed infinitely far away and unimportant. Paul made his own rules and always had, but she was too much like her mother—she spent her precious time circumventing rules, not making them. And yet, here, with the world all hers, she knew the right feeling that one had to have for freedom. You just didn't care what the rules were. You were your own law. That was all there was to it.

Paul was very gay all through supper. When it was finished, he lit a cigarette and said, "Well, that's that. From now on I go on a strict diet. I've got to look so ethereal that the folks'll send me to the South Seas for a year. Oh, I'm going whether they send me or not, but I'm not so keen about working my way."

She gave him a quick, startled look, seeing him sailing right away from her, scudding in a huge sailboat out toward the horizon, never looking back. It wasn't any notion, she knew. He would do it. He would go.

"Want to come along?" he asked, with a sudden lift of dark brows and a look which said he knew, of course, that she wouldn't have the courage.

"I'm going to mother's," she said.

"Oh, yes. So you are—you think. Uncle Ned won't let you, though, when it comes right down to it. And why do you want to? From all I hear, Aunt Julia is getting on very well indeed over there. She won't be delighted to see a grown-up daughter appear on the scene. But you won't go."

"But I will."

"Ten to one you don't. I know too well how Uncle Ned's mind works. He needs you to keep Stella reminded of what happens to wives who don't behave themselves. He ought to ditch her, but he never will—it would reflect on him that he hadn't been able to keep such a beauteous blonde. But he loathes her. She amuses me, though—she's such an out-and-out mercenary, you can't help admiring her."

"I can," Eliza said.

"Detachment—detachment is the key, Eliza."

"You wouldn't be detached if it were your father."

Paul threw back his head and gave that clear, wholly amused laugh. "Let's let the dishes go and read."

"Let's not."

"Slave!" he said, but he pulled himself to his feet and helped her carry the things away. Then they came back to the fire.

Paul read Tonio Kröger aloud. Eliza had a moment of detachment as he read, though at the same time she was terribly moved by the story. She knew quite well that Paul was setting himself up as her intellectual mentor in reading this story. But she didn't mind that, not really. She knew this story very well, but she didn't tell him so.

"Not bad—for a young man to have written," he said at last. Then his brown eyes opened wide in delight at her. "Good heavens, Eliza—you're not weeping?" he exclaimed.

"He meant you to weep," Eliza insisted.

"Of course he did!" Paul said scornfully. "Is that any reason why you must do it? I expect to make a good many people weep before I'm done, but I'll never weep myself."

He went upstairs, whistling softly something very quick and merry. Eliza went into Aunt Pauline's room, got into bed. She thought she was going to lie awake and think, but suddenly it was morning and Paul was pounding on her door and she smelled coffee.

Oh, beautiful, exciting morning, with only the wind for company! With no law but the law of the wind to bind them. This was Paul's natural habitat—wind and water and sun. He was not meant for land, for buildings, for desks. On land he spent his time being cruel to people not so clever as he. But on the sea he seemed to be with his equals and he had a glory about him then. This was the magic she had told Miss Elmslie Paul could make. This was it.

It was almost noon when they walked up the dock and into the road and saw it at the same moment, the long black limousine.

"Oh-oh," Paul said, grinning a little. "The enemy seems to have us hemmed in. A little strategy is called for."

So they walked boldly back to the cottage. There they all were—Uncle Rob and Aunt Pauline, father and Stella.

"Well, what does this mean, young man?" Uncle Rob spoke first.

"What? What does what mean?" Paul asked with a lazy grin.

"Coming down here when you ought to be in school."

Stella spoke. She and Aunt Pauline could not have been more different, but Stella had never let the Griggses high-hat her. She never let snubs get under her skin and managed to keep the upper hand by feline attack, with all claws bared. She had a gift for mimicry and she used it now. Speaking in a voice so like Aunt Pauline's that it was uncanny, she said:

"Oh, Rob, darling, don't be a stuffed shirt! Surely even you must have pursued love's young dream sometime in the far past."

Uncle Rob flushed angrily and Paul laughed with real amusement. "What a lovely, clean mind you have, Aunt Stella!"

But Stella did not flush. She said, "I'm a realist, honey."

Father was so furious he was not trusting himself to speak, Eliza saw. It was seldom that happened, for father had almost perfect control over outward show of emotion.

I was insane to come here. He will use it against me, Eliza thought.

Paul said, "If you knew how funny you look, standing there like judges! Is this a trial, or what? If you'd heard Eliza's plaintive cry against being cooped up with a lot of frustrated old maids, I'm sure you'd have gallantly come to her rescue, Uncle Ned. A little breach of rules isn't a capital crime, I hope. I'm all for it, now and then."

Eliza stood very still, feeling betrayal sap courage out of her very bones. It was like words heard before, long ago, being repeated. It sounded all right, but it was a betrayal, it was offering her up as a sacrifice. It was Paul who had written, saying to be there, that he'd die if he couldn't get out on the Akhnaten and get the professors and isms blown out of his hair.

"Eliza, go and get your things, if you have any. I'll drive you back to school," her father said then, very clearly and with calmness regained. "I'll be back this evening," he said to the rest.

Then Paul strolled out onto the porch as they were getting into the car. "Ten to one!" he called out, grinning at Eliza as if he hadn't betrayed her at all.

The big car moved backward down the drive. Eliza did not answer, did not so much as lift a hand in farewell.

They had driven for half an hour before her father spoke at all. She made up her mind that he should speak first, that she was as strong as he was and could wait as long.

There had been times over her girlhood when she had hated her father for what he had done to her mother. There were other times, though, when she knew just how her father had felt. For she was like him: she had his restraint, his discrimination, his haughtiness. And yet she could not forgive him for having married mother and then having let her go, just because she didn't dress to suit him or talk to suit him or like his family, just because she had a zest for life that he couldn't quench. And sometimes she felt an unholy joy in the fact that Stella had married him and was a thousand times worse than mother. Oh, she dressed well, but she was a wicked, greedy little cat and she knew how to hang onto father and would hang on as long as it suited her to do so. It was a just punishment. Only why did there have to be so much unhappiness among people? I will never marry, she told herself over and over. There was nothing good in marriage, only hurt and disillusionment.

"Well, Eliza?" he said at last, in a grim and distant voice.

"What are you trying to do—make melodrama out of the fact that I went to the cottage for a week end?"

"No, of course not. But it was an outrageous thing to do."

"I don't see anything outrageous about it. We went sailing and read a book—that's all. School gets terribly dull. You'd better be thankful I wasn't having an affair."

"I am. But you must see that it will look to the world as if you were. Conventions are pretty necessary things, whether we like them or not. And the fact that you left school without permission shows you realized this fully. I consider that a very serious thing, Eliza."

"Oh, I don't think I'll be reported."

"Yes, you will. I shall report you myself. Have you ever done this before?"

"Yes, three times," Eliza said.

She saw his hands tighten on the wheel. He didn't talk any more at all till they came to the school.

She got out of the big car, stood there with her bag. "It would be better if you didn't come in," she said.

"No, it might be easier, but not better," e said shortly. "Go up to your room at nce, Eliza. I want to talk to Miss Truscott."

She gave him a small scornful smile, alked across the lounge and up to her oom. At last the gong sounded for supper nd the girls began to pour out into the alls. She rose, washed her face and hands, ent down to the dining room. After supper he slipped away and up to her room again. he had a queer lightheaded feeling. After it as quite dark there was a tap on her door.

"Yes?" she said.

Miss Elmslie opened the door and came in. he looked tired. "May I sit down, Eliza?"

Eliza said, "Of course," and waited.

"Eliza, you know why I am here," Miss lmslie said at last. "You have hurt your ather—and me—very much, Eliza. Miss ruscott was determined o drop you from the chool, but I spoke for you s best I could. I saw you o. I didn't stop you—and o I feel somewhat respon- ble. But you did disobey, nd very deliberately. our father thinks this is just punishment: that ou shall not be given your diploma this une, but after a further summer-school ourse."

Eliza's face seemed to grow smaller, paler. iss Elmslie was deeply troubled.

"I know, my dear, that your summer's lans will be upset—but after all, you broke he rules." Her voice was stern but com- assionate at the same time.

Eliza stood up. "I don't need a diploma," he said. "I wanted one, but I can get along ithout it—and I won't pay that price for it. haven't seen my mother since I was nine nd I am going to see her."

Her voice was sure and clear, and that sur- rised her, for she had never in all her life elt so insecure, so alone. No matter how her eart went groping this way and that after elp, it found none. Not in her father or Aunt Pauline, not in Miss Elmslie, even though she meant to be kind, not in Paul. It was in this moment, rather than in the moments at the bay, that she first fully knew she could never count on Paul again.

Miss Elmslie started to say something, thought better of it, and quietly went out.

A half hour later, Pat Dunning was sitting on Eliza's bed, saying, "I'll have to wait for my allowance. How can you bear to part with it?"

Eliza was holding up her favorite party dress, a gray organdy. "I'd rather have the money," Eliza said.

"How about your blue suit?"

Eliza hesitated. "How much?"

"Ten dollars."

"No. It's worth more than that—and I have to have something to wear."

"Fifteen?"

"I'll see. Look my things over, though, and if there's anything else you want, let me know."

After Pat went out, Eliza got out her fund. Fifty-three dollars and forty cents. The dress would be ten more. Maybe she would have to sell the suit; maybe someone would buy her wrist watch. You could get a freighter ticket for under a hundred.

We should always keep a spare corner in our head to give passing hospitality to our friends' opinions.

—JOUBERT.

Two days later Eliza had a letter addressed in her father's restrained yet interesting backhand.

Dear Eliza: I was sorry not to bid you goodby yesterday, but I was afraid we might both say things we'd be sorry for. I did the best I could for you, as far as the school is concerned, and I think Miss Truscott was very generous with you. It is disappointing not to graduate with your class, I know, but you are fortunate that you are going to be able to graduate at all.

As to your plans for the summer, I must confess I feel a selfish relief that they are not

HOMEMADE PIES— and you don't go near the oven!

No pastry — no baking! And talk about good! Any Del Monte Brand Fruit your grocer has will give you fruity richness, sparkling color, tempting flavor! So plan your pie when you get to the grocery store!

KEEP THESE PIE-MAKING SHORTCUTS IN YOUR COOKBOOK!

Whatever the crust, it's the fruit that makes the pie! Which fruit? Maybe you won't know till you get to your grocer's, these days of shortages. But you do know this — if it's Del Monte, you're sure of flavor-first goodness, orchard ripeness, juicy freshness. That's real pie-insurance: any Del Monte Fruit!

Refrigerator Crusts: Roll cookies, Zweiback or graham crackers between waxed paper to make about 1 cup of very fine crumbs. Mix with 4 tbsps. melted butter, 3 tbsps. sugar; pat into well buttered 8-10" pie plate. Or dip pieces of sponge cake, cut ½" thick, in sherry flavoring mixed with a little water and arrange them in a generously buttered 8-10" pie plate.

Almond Peach Pie: Make cake crust as above. Prepare 3 cups packaged vanilla pudding; fold in 1 stiffly beaten egg white and a few drops almond extract. Pour into crust; cool. Thoroughly drain Del Monte Sliced Peaches; place on filling. "Snitch" a fruit slice — taste that rich flavor! Chill 2 hrs.

Chocolate Apricot Pie: Use crumb crust (directions above). Make 3 cups chocolate pudding. Fold in ½ cup chopped toasted English walnuts, and 1 stiffly beaten egg white. Pour into crust; cool. Top with Del Monte Apricots, thoroughly drained. Mellow-ripe fruit, for sure! Decorate with green candies. Chill pie 2 hrs.

Rosy Pear Pie: In crumb crust described above. Prepare 3 cups vanilla pudding; fold in 1 stiffly beaten egg white, 2 drops red coloring, 2 drops peppermint flavoring. Pour into crust; cool. Thoroughly drain Del Monte Pears — such smooth, tender halves! Arrange on filling. Chill pie 2 hrs.

Remember! Del Monte puts be consummated. It would have been a iod of disillusionment for you, and one nts that put off as long as possible. And, in selfishly, I shall be happy to have you h me for at least a part of the summer. u will have a full three weeks before summer ool opens, and I am planning to take that e and go to the bay. Stella wants to go to mountains and is, I believe, planning to do We will have a good long stretch for walks sailing and I am looking forward to it with ie eagerness. I need the stimulation of your r, analytical mind, my dear.

You will probably have extra need for money the end of the year, so I enclose a bit more n usual. Lovingly, Eliza held the letter tight in her hands and d it all through twice. Its cleverness de her angry down to her toes, but its peal touched her all the same. The appeal s part of the cleverness, she knew, and l it moved her. He knew she would recog- e the concessions in it; he knew that lla's going to the mountains—and telling , Eliza, of that going—was a clear call for companionship; and in spite of herself, was proud that he asked for that com- ionship. Then she looked at the check l her face grew quiet and her mouth very n. Fifty dollars. She put it carefully in flat pocketbook with her passport.

ree mornings later, at eleven, Eliza ggs, in her plain blue suit, with a camel's- r topcoat over her arm, stood on the deck a dingy little freighter moving out of timore harbor.

Nowhere is time so kaleidoscoped as on a t; nowhere do you so fast create a world; where do intimacies become established quickly. On the third day Eliza looked from her dessert at the captain's table, l everyone there was someone she had own all her life. Captain Jensen, the ioman, the doctor and his wife, Mr. popoulos, who "dealt in rugs," and rian Vandermeer, the young Dutch en- eer who was going to Germany and Russia look at engineering projects before he rted out on his own. She liked them all fully much, partly perhaps because they e together outside of time, in the ordinary se of the word.

But Adrian Vandermeer was different. ferent, and somehow frightening, because seemed to take it for granted that this rteen days was not all, that they would doubtedly see each other again, in or- ary time. She had never known anyone t like him. He wasn't remotely like Paul, l yet he seemed to have as quick a mind. y he didn't use his mind for the things il did. He didn't seem to care very much ut people, what they thought of him, gs like that. He didn't want to control ple. He was interested in bridges and chinery, roads and such things. He sn't what she'd always pictured as a tchman. There was nothing stolid, phleg- tic about him. He was tall and wiry and y quick and his blue eyes were always used, though he could be serious enough en he talked. But to Eliza, used to iousness, analysis, complexity, his lack of iousness was strangely exhilarating.

"How old are you?" he asked the first e they stood alone together on the deck.

"Seventeen."

"Seventeen, eh?" His brows shot up in amused, incredulous fashion. "As young hat? I thought you were at least twenty. y are you traveling about alone?"

"I'm joining my mother in France."

"Oh? Your father is dead?"

"No. They're divorced."

"That's why you look so old, I suppose," said matter-of-factly. "How about a e of table tennis?"

o they played table tennis together and ked the deck and listened to the radio, yed with the rest of the passengers a com- ated guessing game, laughed a good deal young and very normal way, made bets the ship's log, paying them off with the derful Danish pastries they had at tea- e every day.

The terribly nice thing about him was that while he did the things with her that you might do with any schoolgirl, he simply took it for granted that her mind was grown up, that everyone had complex problems but didn't want to talk about them, that she was capable of coping with them without any help from him. Once she thought, I feel so free with him. I don't remember ever having felt so free. Not even on the Akhnaten.

On the last night she walked with Adrian on the deck. There was a wind blowing and her hair whipped about her shoulders and she fastened her coat at the throat.

"You haven't given me your mother's address," he said suddenly and seriously.

"No."

He paused near the door of the tiny lounge where there was light, took a notebook from his pocket and stood, holding it against the doorframe, waiting. She gave it to him and he wrote it in the little book.

"I don't know when I'll be down," he said as they walked on. "But sometime toward the end of July or the first of August, I imagine. I am going to visit my grandmother in Rotterdam first, then go to Germany for a few weeks. I wish you and grandmother could meet. She's quite wonderful."

"I've got a wonderful grandmother too," Eliza said.

They smiled at each other through the darkness, and then didn't talk about grandmothers any more.

"I'll expect you to write to me, you know. American Express, Berlin'll do. You will, won't you?"

"Yes."

---

My father used to say, "Never suspect people. It's better to be deceived or mistaken, which is only human, after all, than to be suspicious, which is common."

—STARK YOUNG: Feliciana (Scribner's).

---

They had circled the little deck already and stood again in the light from the lounge door. Then he said, not looking at her, but in a voice oddly urgent:

"You will hurry and get to be twenty, won't you?"

Eliza had learned not to be solemn in the way of the young and simple, but she felt suddenly solemn. "I'll hurry," she said.

They hadn't much of a good-by the next morning.

"You haven't forgotten—American Express, Berlin—have you?" he asked.

"No," she said.

"Good-by, then—till August, Eliza," he told her.

"Good-by."

And that was all there was to it. There seemed no outward reason why it seemed inwardly so important, why his long, eager, blue-eyed face should stay in her vision so long after he had gone.

She did not look like a girl with problems. She sat there in her third-class carriage, upright, yet with that air of relaxation the poised have, a lovely-looking American girl with her fine, soft, almost straight fair hair to her shoulders, her plain white blouse showing very clean and smart-looking above the French blue of her plain suit, her eyes on the landscape in the almost bored way of the seasoned traveler. But that was only on the outside.

Inwardly she was gathering her forces, pulling the years together toward this ultimate flight to her mother. You cannot have a goal for eight years without being a little frightened when the goal is actually in sight. Her mother had never even urged her to come, and yet Eliza had never once doubted that her mother wanted her. She knew a little better now all the things in her mother that had irritated her father—she was enough her father's daughter for that—and yet she had never swerved from her position on her mother's side.

Oh, I hope she likes what I've come to be! she thought with a humility deep and all-encompassing.

The next noon, a little worn from the night sitting up in the train, from her coping with money and taxis, from her thought, she walked up the steep steps to the Villa Marguerita, on a hill outside Menton. At one side of the villa, looking out toward the sea, was a wide terrace, with three large, crooked pine trees at one end. On the terrace sat three people, two men and a woman, in long wicker chairs. Eliza left her bag at the front, walked toward their mildly curious faces.

She took them all in: the violet slacks and yellow silk jersey of the man with the reddish mustache and thinning hair and decadent, melancholy wiseness; the more conventional white linen and blue shirt of the more wide-awake American-looking man; her mother. Her mother, tall and terribly thin, her mouth made up to look wider than life, her dark eyes hidden by dark glasses with light blue tortoise-shell rims, too many rings on her thin hand on the chair's arm, bright cerise sandals to match her jacket, her hair hanging long as Eliza's, but cut with bangs across her forehead. Her mother, but so thin—so thin.

"Hello, mother," she said past the curious eyes of the men, to the hidden dark eyes.

THERE was an instant when her mother became so still, so unnaturally still, that everything in the world quieted and ceased breathing with her. Then the long legs swung over the side of the chair stool and the tall figure was coming toward her with such eagerness, such real and devouring eagerness; the glasses were pulled off with one ringed hand and the dark eyes were taking her in; Eliza's fair head was resting against the cerise jacket and her mother was murmuring:

"Eliza! Eliza! Darling! Oh, baby!"

Eliza's eyes filled with tears, tears of happiness and relief.

Her mother, with her arm still about Eliza, said quickly to the two men, "Go away. I un-invite you for luncheon. Go away, please. It is my little girl, my baby, from America. . . . André, Laurence—my daughter, Eliza. . . . Now go away and come some other time. I can't be bothered with you now!"

The men got to their feet, protesting, laughing. André, the one with the too wise eyes, was uttering the most preposterous compliments, staring at Eliza with the utmost boldness and plainly finding her exciting and enchanting—saying so in rapid French. Laurence laughed more, but he, too, seemed to be finding Eliza amazing and interesting.

Her mother deliberately turned her back on the two men, moving with Eliza toward the open long windows. "You may come tomorrow," she said over her shoulder to them. She drew Eliza into the small drawing room, pushed her into a deep chair. "Sit there, darling, where I can look at you. . . . And be grateful it isn't one of those gilt-legged French affairs you're sitting in. I can't abide French furniture—this may be dumpy, but people like to sit in it, all the same. . . . Now tell me—how did you get here? How did it happen? Why didn't you cable me? When your father's letter came saying you wouldn't be here, I felt such—such a desolation." The word, sounding French and unbearably mournful, hung in the air a moment before her mother rushed on: "You look so grown up, darling. Oh, baby, we've got so much to talk about. We'll never catch up—never! I never was good at letters, was I? . . . Are you hungry?"

Eliza laughed aloud. The laughter sounded, even to herself, giddy with happiness. "I'm starved," she said. "I ate light coming, for fear my money wouldn't hold out. Just a crust of bread'll do."

"Then wait—wait right here. Don't move, darling. I'll bring you something!"

But Eliza, no longer tired, jumped up and came with her mother to the kitchen. The kitchen was gay, with copper pans on the wall and flowers, red geraniums, on the sill. Eliza sat on a tall stool with a woven-rush top, and her mother took eggs from a tiny icebox and broke them into a bowl, began to beat them, her rings flashing incongruously in the light.

"But tell me! Tell me all!" she commanded.

"I'm here. That's all that seems to matter," Eliza said, and all the years seemed to vanish, and it was true—nothing mattered out of them at all but that she'd got here.

"But your father was so definite. I've just been doing things every minute to forget how sick I was—oh, not in-bed sickness, just the 'hope deferred maketh the heart sick' kind. Do you like tomatoes in your omelet? But of course you do!" She poured the omelet in the pan, all with an air of efficiency that no longer required thought. "Do you want to take a cloth out for a table on the terrace? In this drawer."

"Oh, let's sit here. It's nice here," Eliza said.

Everything was suddenly so right. The pure gladness of her mother's welcome, the cleanness and brightness of this kitchen with the copper pans winking away at her from the wall, the blue Mediterranean, the blotting out of Yew Valley and all it stood for, the days ahead with no examinations in the offing, no pretending to do, with August coming and maybe Adrian Vandermeer sitting with them out there on the terrace in the long chairs—it was all too perfect and sweet and right to need words. Even the unfamiliar red mouth on her mother did not hide her mother. The extravagant cerise jacket and bright blue slacks, together with all the rings, were so like her mother. She was not only what she had been—she was more so.

"Oh, but you eat too! I can't be so piggish all alone," she said.

"I'm too excited to eat, darling. I just want to look at you. . . . But how did you get here?"

"I ran away," Eliza said. "Oh, they know by now. I came on a freighter. It was fun."

Her mother dished strawberries slowly into two small dishes before she said, "Won't your father be upset?"

"Yes, I suppose he will. But not so upset as I'd have been if I'd stayed home."

"Did you cable him you'd got here?"

"No. I sent a card from Cherbourg."

"You'd better cable." She got up, went and got a pad, put it with a pencil on the table beside Eliza. "Just write you're here—I'll send it," she said.

Eliza wrote obediently: 'Arrived safely. All well. Love, Eliza." Her mother picked it up, went to the phone. Eliza could hear her talking quickly, in French. It wasn't very good French, Eliza noted, with a throb of sharp tenderness, but it was fluent. Then she heard a little thump-thump on the stairs. She picked up her berries and moved toward the terrace, and coming down the stairs—in pieces, as it were—was the longest, most ridiculous dachshund she had ever seen. She forgot the moment's uneasiness at being connected with America and her father again and laughed aloud.

"It's Lord Chesterfield!" her mother called. "Isn't he a love? André gave him to me—for that I forgive him much."

THE laughter died inside Eliza. Something in her mother's voice was suddenly out of a loneliness so deep, so awful that it shocked Eliza into silence. But almost at once her mother rattled on:

"Tell me, does Yew Valley look just the same? Are they just as snooty there as ever? Is Uncle Rob the same old stuffed shirt? And that nasty little piece, Paul—is he as unpleasant as ever? I always thought he'd end up in jail!"

"He's in college, which is the same as jail to him," Eliza said.

"College—Paul? Can he be that old?"

"Let's not think about Yew Valley," Eliza begged. "I want to think about here. It's just the way I thought it would be, only sweeter. I could imagine the sea and even the house, a little, but I never imagined Lord Chesterfield."

"I never told you about Lord Chesterfield? That's funny. Or maybe it isn't—I got him once when I was sick. It was a baddish sort of time. Then Lord Chesterfield came inching through the door, and all of a sudden everything got funny, and I began to get well."

"You never wrote me you'd been sick."

"Oh? Didn't I?" her mother said a little vaguely, as if it weren't important. "But where's your luggage?" she demanded.

Eliza laughed and jumped up. "On the front steps," she said.

Her mother came with her and took her up to a little room that looked toward the heavenly blue sea. A plain little room, but so sweet.

"I don't know why, but it makes me think of grandma's," Eliza said.

"Grandma Goodspeed's? Heaven forbid!"

"It's so clean, I guess that's it."

Her mother gave an odd laugh. "'You can eat off her attic floor'—that's what they used to say of mother," she said.

"And so you could," Eliza said, opening her suitcase, taking out her few dresses. "Only we had to put papers down, all the same, when we played up there. I tried on your wedding dress once."

"My wedding dress?"

"Yes. The satin one. The one you were going to marry Uncle Will in. I used to wonder about that—why you ran away and all. But I see now—it was the same reason, really, that made me run away and come here. But I never could see how you even thought about marrying him. It always seemed awfully queer to me—though he was nice. Very nice."

"I'd never been away from Academyville much," her mother said. "What a love of a dress! I can see your father's taught you how to dress. He never had much luck with me. . . . Do you like to swim?"

"Love to."

"We'll go down to the shore after you're unpacked. We have a private path down the hill—you can wear your bathing suit."

"I didn't bring any—I sold mine."

"I'll give you one." She went out and came back with a suit of bright purple.

Eliza winced, but she took the suit. She stood holding it, looking at her mother with a sudden rush of love in her cool gray-blue eyes. "Oh, mother, I'm here!" she cried.

And for that day, for the next and the next, that was all that mattered. They talked and talked. They ate and laughed and swam, and talked and talked and talked. All in a passion of gaiety and relief at talking the same language. People came, gay, sophisticated people who were interestingly strange. Eliza didn't like them much. Everyone made a fuss over her. She was flattered inordinately by the Frenchmen. Her mother amused them, too, she saw. She was naïve from their viewpoint, but they liked to come. Perhaps it was the chairs, or the food. Sometimes Eliza had seen mothers who apologized for having children so big, when they still looked young themselves, but her mother was never like that. She was always unstinting in her pride. It touched Eliza, somehow, made her feel peculiarly safe and loved. It was always just as it had used to be when she'd run in from school and her mother had called to her, "I'm up here, darling!"

Once after the terrace had emptied her mother said, "They're a poor lot, aren't they?"

"They're fun," Eliza protested, but a little slowly.

"A poor lot," her mother repeated.

But generally her mother was gay, full of spontaneous chatter, suggestions for fun, for excitement. She bought Eliza a few clothes, collected several young men to beau her about. They were charming boys, all mannerly and with a touch of elegance. One of them, called Jacques, Eliza liked. His mother was American, which made him seem half familiar. André and Laurence were the ones most often at the house. They brought her presents and seemed to vie for her favor.

But all the time, she was conscious of a faint apprehension, a tiny cloud in the blue sky of her happiness. She didn't know just what it was.

One afternoon she sat on the beach in her purple bathing suit and young Jacques Lamont stretched on the sand beside her. Her mother was swimming lazily not far away.

"I wish mother weren't so thin," she said with sudden anxiety.

"She doesn't eat," Jacques said. "She's been thin ever since she was so ill in the winter."

"She's never told me what was the matter with her," Eliza said anxiously.

He looked at her with a sort of mocking curiosity. "Oh, it was a heart attack of some sort, I think. I always think it's rather silly to let your passions devour you at your mother's age, don't you?"

"What do you mean?"

"Why, just that. She ought to get rid of André—she's not clever enough for him, and it must be wearing trying to hang onto him. He's not much good, anyway."

"André? You mean he's mother's lover?"

HE gave a slow, delighted laugh. "Oh, Eliza, you are wonderful!" he said. "So un-French. Of course he's her lover."

"I don't believe that," she said flatly.

"Oh, but it's true! To tell you the truth, the affair's always intrigued me. I like your mother, mind you. She's got a heart, which is rare around here, I can tell you. But I don't see why André, who hasn't a heart, likes her. Sometimes I think he gets a kind of pleasant shock out of her appallingly bad taste—a perversion, but sometimes I think it's it."

"You sound just like Paul," she said in sudden anger.

She stood up. Even in the purple suit she was lovely, slim and young and exceedingly graceful. She called to her mother that she was going up now, and began to walk up toward the hill path. Jacques called after her to wait, but she didn't even look around and he did not follow her.

On the next night, when her mother had been sitting by her bed telling her all sorts of funny stories about people she knew in Menton and Nice, she fell suddenly silent. She sat there for some time, never saying a word. She had on a dress of gold color with purple stones in the belt. It looked garish but it was the kind of dress she wore.

"Well, you'd better get to sleep," she said at last and got up. Then, at the door, she turned and demanded sharply, almost agonizingly, "What is she like?"

"She?" Eliza asked—stupidly, she knew.

"Stella. What is she like?"

"Stella? Why—she's like no one. Like Stella. She—she's beautiful, in a very blond sort of way. Cold and glittering." She felt frightened, confused.

"And knows how to wear her clothes in a Yew Valley sort of way," her mother said in that same angry, demanding voice.

"Yes, she has frightfully good clothes," Eliza said. "But she's horrible, really. She—she's greedy. She—she never lets go of anything. She—mother, what is it? What's the matter?" For her mother had put her hand up in slow motion to her side and swayed a little.

"I—a little dizzy—it will pass," her mother murmured, and slipped with a little thud to the floor.

Eliza was out of bed in one movement on the floor by her mother. "Mother! Mummy!" she said over and over, then she ran to the bathroom, brought water spilling on her bare feet from her palms, splashed the rest in her mother's face. But her mother did not stir. Eliza ran down the stairs, called the first number she could remember, André's, and André answered sleepily. "This is Eliza—get mother's doctor. She's ill," she said, almost in one breath.

"Oui. The pink bottle in bathroom—spoonful in water—quick. I will come."

red-faced, enormously capable. "Eliza, ld you get hold of some money?"
I don't know. Why?"
Thinking about a partnership. You've n here three years, know the ropes. With y a little expansion, this could be a very d living for the two of us. Would you it to?"
I'd like to very much—but I can't."
Why not?" Miss Hovis demanded im-iently. "You're quite capable. Don't think we could get along?"
Oh, yes. It's nothing to do with you or work. I'd like it. But I have other ponsibilities."
Nonsense! What other responsibili-? You haven't got yourself married be-d my back, have you?"
No."
Miss Hovis got up. hout another word she t for her coat. "Think ver," she said suddenly with a sharp kind-s. "Sleep on it. Good t, Eliza."
Good night," Eliza said.
fter she had gone, Eliza stood up and ked to the window. The fog was too k to see anything but an occasional k of light. The world looked gray and l and frightening.
he phone in the reception room rang ly and she walked toward it, without te. "Miss Hovis' office," she said.
Darling—you haven't left?"
Mother—are you out of bed?"
Of course not! You didn't say where you e having dinner, darling."
I don't know, mother. We may go any-re. You know how Stella likes to move ut! . . . Are you liking the book?"
Not much." Her mother's voice was denly dull.
Oh? I thought it was quite gay. Well, e got to put on my good blouse, darling, my Yew Valley face. I'll be home early. ght, mother."

She went into the washroom, cleaned up a bit, took her gold blouse from the hanger, put it on. She looked very elegant now, very sleek and knowing. She put on a small black-and-gold feathered hat that dipped over one eye. It was still early. She went again to the window, stared down at the foggy world below. Then the door opened and she turned, startled. A flash of lightning, a falcon, a sharp blaze of glory dressed in an air officer's uniform.

"Paul!"

"Eliza, my lovely one! My gullible darling! Are you glad to see me?"

"No," she said.

He laughed. "You lie in your teeth!" he said. He sat on the edge of the desk, drew her a little toward him, looked her up and down appraisingly. Then he said, "You really are something, Lizzie. But I always knew you would turn out something pretty special!"

"You always knew everything," she said.

He let go her hands, said reproachfully, "What a welcome! I'm beginning to wish I'd spent my furlough in Scotland." Then his eyes sparkled with a secret wickedness and he went on: "Even Aunt Julia was a little offish."

Her face seemed to freeze. "You've seen mother?" she asked slowly.

"Just came from her. Quite a girl, Aunt Julia! Always intrigued me."

"Why did you go to see mother? You've never liked her."

"Like her? I don't like anyone, pet. Just wanted to catch up on family gossip, that's all. Aunt Julia's not so inhibited as some branches of the family."

Eliza looked down at her watch, her eyes still cold and distant. "I have to go," she said. "I'm meeting dad."

"All taken care of, my sweet. You're meeting me and we're catching onto the

WHY CAN'T YOU
WRITE?

It's much simpler than you think!

SO many people with the "germ" of writing in them simply can't get started. They suffer from inertia. Or they set up imaginary barriers to taking the first step.

Many are convinced the field is confined to persons gifted with a genius for writing.

Few realize that the great bulk of commercial writing is done by so-called "unknowns." Not only do these thousands of men and women produce most of the fiction published, but countless articles on homemaking, business, fashions, decorating, local, club and church activities, etc., as well.

Such material is in constant demand. Every week thousands of checks for $25, $50 and $100 go out to writers whose latent ability was perhaps no greater than yours.

The Practical Method

NEWSPAPER work demonstrates that the way to learn to write is by writing! Newspaper copy desk editors waste no time on theories or ancient classics. The story is the thing. Every copy "cub" goes through the course of practical criticism—a training that turns out more successful authors than any other experience.

That is why Newspaper Institute of America bases its writing instruction on the Copy Desk Method. It starts and keeps you writing in your own home, on your own time. And upon the very same kind of actual assignments given daily to metropolitan reporters. Thus you learn by doing, not by studying the individual styles of model authors.

Each week your work is analyzed constructively by practical writers. Writing soon becomes easy, absorbing. Profitable, too, as you gain the "professional" touch that gets your material accepted by editors. Above all, you can see constant progress—week by week—as your faults are corrected and your writing ability grows.

party for dinner. Mother and dad are here too. Sit down. We've got lots of time."

"Did you tell mother where we were having dinner?"

"I may have. I don't really remember. Why?"

Eliza said, "Let's go, shall we?"

"Let's not. Let's just sit here and be sentimental and reminiscent. Remember the Akhnaten, darling?"

"Yes, I remember the Akhnaten. I remember everything. But I don't feel like hashing over the past tonight. I don't remember it with any great tenderness, you see. I'm glad you're safe—but I'm not really glad to see you, Paul."

He became sober, completely sober. "You can't chuck off the past as easily as all that. We're outsiders in the Griggs clan, 'Liza—we have to stick together."

"I used to think that too. But doesn't it have to work both ways? I suppose you're in a jam of some sort."

His eyes flashed a look of wicked laughter. "A jam to end all jams," he admitted more lightly. "But I will not marry her. You know, darling, there are disadvantages in being fastidious. If I'd picked a Daughter of the People—but, no, I had to have one who knew all the answers. She's another Aunt Stella, to a t."

"All right. It's nothing to do with me."

"But it is! You know how dad's always been so fond of you. I want you to develop a grand passion for me for a month or two, darling. There's no law against attachments between cousins in this state, you know. If it's to save little Eliza from a broken heart, dad'll come across. It's a bit crude, but I haven't much time, you see. Nothing binding, of course, sweet—just till after the settlement. You will, won't you? You can put it down as a patriotic duty. I have been counting on you."

She stood up. "We'll have to go. And you can't count on me, Paul. Not any more."

He moved toward the door with her. "But I do, darling. Against all reason, I do."

Soon they were walking out into the fog. In the cab, Paul gave an abrupt, really amused laugh. "You know, my sweet cousin, I wouldn't find it hard at all! You always did have a kind of inscrutability that was intriguing—but now you're beautiful to boot."

Then they were walking into the restaurant. Her father and Stella, Aunt Pauline and Uncle Rob were sitting at a large round table toward the front of the long narrow room. The familiar Yew Valley chatter rose up like the fog outside.

Uncle Rob said, "You're looking very pretty tonight, 'Liza. How come you aren't married? Are all the men blind, or what?"

Paul said, not quite gaily, with a touch of sincerity, "She was waiting for me, dad. Weren't you, Eliza?"

SUDDENLY Eliza felt in the midst of the spell that Paul used to put on her as a child. She had such a sense of kinship with him that she had an impulse to reach out and touch his hand on the table, to say to him, I'll play it your way, Paul. I always have, haven't I? But in that moment she looked down the room and saw her mother sitting with a man at a table. She had on her dress with the sequins and she sparkled down the vista like a chorus girl. She was made up outrageously, and the man with her was a broker called Hanson, who was peculiarly loathsome to Eliza. Her mother looked up and met Eliza's eyes. The vivacity died out of her mother's face and it stood out, naked in its pleading and defiance, in the midst of the correctness of the gay restaurant. Eliza did not even smile. She turned and said:

"No, I wasn't waiting for you—or anyone. Do I have to be married, Uncle Rob? To tell you the truth, I'm a little off matrimony as an institution."

Her father said, "Don't rush Eliza, Rob. She'll marry when she gets around to it."

"I'll never marry," she said calmly.

"She doesn't mean it," Paul put in quietly. "She's just one of these wise ones of this generation who have learned to wait. But I agree with you, dad—I think she's waited long enough."

"While you're deciding my future, could I have some more coffee?" she said. Her voice was willfully light against the solemnity of the moment. They all laughed, but the solemnity did not quite go away.

It was over at last, that interminable dinner. They stood up and wandered out to the street. Inside, Julia Griggs still sat there with Mr. Hanson. Nothing much had happened. Another of those difficult family parties which took place every few months had been lived through.

"Why don't you come down to Yew Valley for the week end?" Aunt Pauline was saying. "I'm sure Paul would love it—we bore him."

"Sorry. I'm going to be busy," Eliza said.

"Nonsense!" Paul said. "Of course you'll come. I'll take you home now."

She protested, but they found a cab and went threading through the dim traffic. At first Paul didn't speak, but at last he said:

"You let me down, darling."

"So I did. Is there any reason I should hold you up?"

"I counted on you."

She felt a sudden tiredness and trembling all through her. "I'm sorry," she said, and she was sorry. She felt a deep and terrible sorrow for people who counted on other people and were let down.

They had come to her apartment house; the cabman had stepped out and opened the door. Paul got out for an instant. "You will come down Saturday, won't you?" he said.

"I'll see. I don't think I can. Good night, Paul."

She walked into the apartment she shared with her mother. Its lushness and brightness affronted her, but there was a certain air of comfort, a certain lived-in atmosphere that never failed to touch her.

It wasn't more than ten or fifteen minutes before she heard her mother coming down the hall, opening the door. She sat quite still, hands clasped about her knees. But silently she was crying out, Why didn't you tell me Paul was here? Why did you pretend you didn't know where we were going? How could you go there? Haven't you any pride? Don't you know it's dangerous? Didn't the doctor say you had to stay in bed for at least three days? Don't you know you can't stand these emotional orgies? And did it have to be Hanson? Did you want it to be Hanson, just to show him how far you'd fallen? Oh, mother, mother, darling mother—how could you?

Her mother was hanging away the dramatic little jacket she had worn. "Well, don't sit there looking like the Grand Inquisitor!" she said suddenly.

"Is that what I look like? Mother, do you know what I'd like to do?"

"What?"

"I'd like to go to Academyville for Thanksgiving with grandma."

"Good heavens! Academyville! You're out of your mind."

"No, I'd like to. Will you?"

"Oh, stop trying to be a trained nurse, Eliza! I'd rather crack up having a little fun than rot out twenty years in Academyville."

"Are you having fun?" Eliza asked.

Her mother was standing in front of the ornate mirror staring at herself. "I think she's beginning to show her years, don't you?" she demanded suddenly.

Eliza felt tears pressing at her lids, but she said almost ruthlessly, "Frankly, no. She doesn't worry, you see."

Her mother turned quickly. "And I do, I suppose you mean? Eliza, you're turning into something very unpleasant, do you know it? You fancy yourself as a kind of watchdog, don't you? After all, I'm past forty and I don't exactly need a watchdog. I know you're thinking I haven't any pride or anything, that I cheated about the doctor and all that—but I haven't got any pride any more, Eliza. I can't bear to see him looking so old and so worn out. I can't bear it. You despise me, I know, but I can't help it."

"I don't despise you. Don't be silly, mother; I just want you to be happy. Dad's been married to Stella for ten years. I don't think he's going to be unmarried. Why can't you accept that fact and go on from there? Why don't you marry again and build yourself a life?"

"You don't know what you're talking about, Eliza. You've never known what it is to love someone."

"That's not true," Eliza said. "I know all about it. But if you can't have it, you can't have it. You have to go on from there."

"Eliza, honey! What do you mean? Who?"

Out of a long-secret silence Eliza spoke quite calmly: "I fell in love when I was seventeen. That's a long time ago, mother, but it was real enough. I haven't heard from him in four years. I'm just telling you so you'll know I know what I'm talking about."

"Was it Jacques, darling?"

"No!" Eliza said sharply. "Don't quiz me, mother. It's no one you have ever known."

She had a sense of betrayal of her seventeen-year-old self, also a feeling of relief that she had shocked her mother out of her preoccupation with her own troubles. Oh, it was so hard to know what was betrayal and what was not, when was the time for confidences, what was the deepest loyalty!

"But, Eliza—you're young! You mustn't let something like that hang on."

ELIZA laughed. "Oh, please, mother—be consistent! I'm not letting it hang on, though. It's over. . . . How would you like to make some tea and toast?"

Her mother obediently went to the tiny kitchen, put on the kettle. It was this real love, this desire to comfort that was deep in her mother, that so moved Eliza, so bound her to her. The outside tension died, but when her mother was in bed Eliza sat on by the fire, exhausted all through, wishing she had not told her mother, wishing her secret sorrow back in its hiding place, wishing desperately for some strength that would see her through the years. Maybe it was because it was autumn, and foggy. Maybe it was just that the war had gone on too long and the pressure of the war years had flattened her heart too thin.

She thought suddenly and wryly of the advice she had offered her mother.

Why don't you marry, my girl? she asked herself. It isn't because of something sweet but fleeting that happened to you when you were seventeen years old, is it? No, of course it wasn't, though that had kept her going till she was twenty and past. She had hurried to get to be twenty. But since then? No, I'm just conditioned against matrimony, she admitted. I've never seen it work. She had liked certain men quite a good deal. She went out occasionally and was gay. But when she looked at her mother's ravaged face, her father's tired face, Uncle Rob's smug face—no, she wanted no part of it.

She turned out the gas, went to bed, but she did not sleep at once. She was too tired for sleep. The future seemed too difficult. Seven years of her life had slipped away—where? Like a breath time had passed and she was twenty-four years old. And what was there of her own private, deeply personal life that mattered? A small sheaf of matter-of-fact letters from European cities. A four-year silence. And no way of knowing whether, if Adrian Vandermeer had come back, anything would have ever been any different.

The last letter had been from Rotterdam. It had been all about his grandmother and the house, and all that was personal in it had been: "And now you tell me about your wonderful grandmother."

She had told him; she had written such a long, detailed letter about Academyville and Grandma Goodspeed, about being a little girl there with grandma that winter. Silence. Nothing but a deep and impenetrable silence. Perhaps he had died in Rotterdam. Sometimes she was sure he had. Sometimes she thought he had married someone else. Sometimes she thought he had just tired of her childish letters. But four years of trying to outwait a silence was too much. She was too adult to wait any longer. Only, if the silence no longer seemed important, what of reality should she put in its place? Her mind

A NEW COAT FOR SEBASTIAN

THERE are in Macedonia today two war orphans named Sebastian and Petros who are living in a cave outside their native village. They have between them two ragged suits and a coat which they take turns wearing, though Sebastian, who is eleven, is tall and his arms hang down from the sleeves.

The coat is a symbol of life to the brothers; and indeed, their very lives depend on its wool threads. It came to them one magic day last spring, when villagers lined up at relief headquarters while boxes from America were opened. The brothers stood at the end of the line, the March rain beating down on their cropped heads, and cold mud seeping through the rags on their bony feet. Silent, they looked on as friends and neighbors reappeared in garments that hung together without a patch, garments that were too big, but whose radiant wearers would not give them up for a minute, even to try a better fit. Sebastian and Petros began to believe, as they gradually moved to the front, that somehow the strange miracle was going to happen to them. And then they reached the U. S. lady at the door—and knew from the look on her face that the miracle had given out.

Blinking, little Petros looked around at the empty boxes, took Sebastian's hand and turned to go. They did not see the American lady as she walked to the coat stand in the corner and took down a bright plaid jacket, but as they started through the door, Petros felt her hand on his shoulder.

A coat—of different colors!—and she was holding it out to him. While Petros looked on dumbly, Sebastian took the coat from the lady, staring from it to her and thanking her in Greek. Putting it on Petros, he wrapped his arms around it to feel and smell the good warm wool. All the way back to their cave home, they kept staring at the coat, handing it back and forth and trying it on.

That was almost a year ago, and still Sebastian has not been to school. At night he shares The Coat with Petros; but in the daytime, winter sunlight fails to warm his bones. They have been chilled every long winter since he was seven, with no relief except the spring. . . .

Henry J. Kaiser, at President Truman's urgent call, is heading the Victory Clothing Collection beginning January seventh, and America is asked again to give old clothes to save life and bring new hope to the world. Wrap up Johnny's outgrown shoes for Petros, and your old shapeless tweed for Sebastian. It is a time for giving, even if you have nothing "to spare." It is a time for remembering the story of the King who said: "I was naked, and ye clothed me . . . ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

groped fruitlessly after something. Something not of sacrifice, of filial devotion, something her own, to have and to hold against the ugliness of the world. There was nothing.

In the morning she carried her mother's tray in and her mother, wan without her make-up, sat up in bed and smiled at her with loving gratitude. "You're so patient with your mother, darling," she said.

Eliza laughed and told her to be sure to eat her egg. That would be all there'd be said about last night.

At the office Miss Hovis came in briskly, hung up her coat, dictated three letters, then said, "Well, Eliza? Did you sleep on it?"

"I didn't need to. I'm sorry, but I just can't do it."

"All right. You're a fool, but it's your own business, I suppose."

The phone rang and it was her father. "I didn't have much chance to visit with you last night. How about lunch?" he asked.

It was always a worldly pleasure to eat with her father. He looked distinguished, and even his present tiredness did not deprive him of his air of authority and intelligence. Even Stella had not lessened him, and this fact never failed to feed Eliza's pride in him. She knew he could be cruel. She knew he had made a number of ghastly mistakes in his life. But she was proud of him, all the same.

It wasn't till they had come to coffee that he said, "I seem to have been a little blind about your affairs, Eliza."

"Blind?"

"Yes. About you and Paul. I never dreamed of such a thing till last night. It was something of a shock, I'll admit, but now I've thought it over, it seems natural and right enough."

Eliza laughed, clearly and amusedly. "Sorry," she said, "but that did sound funny. Whatever gave you the idea that there was anything between Paul and me? Was it because he said last night that I'd been waiting for him? Really, dad! Why, I don't even like Paul! I'll tell you the plot, then you'll see how funny it is. He's got himself in a jam with some girl over there and he's going to be sued for a lot of money. He just thought Uncle Rob would come across faster and easier if he thought our happiness depended on it. I'm afraid your nice little dream of a little Griggs community in Yew Valley is futile. I meant what I said last night. I never intend to marry."

He looked at her with troubled eyes. "Why, Eliza?"

"Well, I've not had very good examples set me," she said clearly, trying for a teasing, amused smile.

"I was afraid that was what you were thinking. I do feel responsibility for some of the confusion in your life, believe me. But the world wouldn't get on if everybody waited for perfection, child."

"Maybe I don't care whether it gets on or not."

"I think you do. I wouldn't want you to marry just for the sake of marrying, heaven knows. But you ought to, Eliza."

"All right, dad, you've done your fatherly duty. But there doesn't happen to be anyone I want to marry at the moment. . . . I have to run now. Miss Hovis is out for the afternoon and I must be there."

He paid the bill. They walked out into the sharp autumn noontime. "You'll come down Sunday, won't you?" he asked then.

"I'll try," she said. "Good-by, dad."

When she told her mother she had been invited to Yew Valley for Sunday her mother said, "But of course you must go, dear."

"Yew Valley bores me," Eliza said.

But she went.

A strange, fantastic nightmare of a day it turned out to be. Paul met her train. "Well, I've broken the news to dad," he said on the way to the house. They were all meeting at Aunt Pauline's for dinner.

"Broken what news?"

"Of our long-hidden passion for each other."

She was silent with the coldness of her fury. She couldn't even laugh at him. But at last she said, "You know, Paul, I've never known any really wicked people. But you're really wicked, aren't you? You don't care what means you use to gain your ends. But I don't want to be used, Paul, and I don't intend to be. Is that plain enough?"

"Aren't you hitting below the belt?" Paul asked quite seriously. "It isn't all pretending, Eliza. I'm not fooling—there's no one like you in the world for me."

"You'd even try that," she said in a flat, despairing voice.

It was at the end of the day, when she'd gone up after her coat and hat, that the really worst moment came. Aunt Pauline came in, watched her put her hat on.

"Paul's told us, Eliza," she said. "We're very pleased, really. We think it would be nice to have the wedding here—after all, we hope it has been like another home to you. I think it would please Paul awfully if you could be married before he goes back. It could be simple, you know. No one's fussing in wartime."

Eliza stood staring at her. "Aunt Pauline, I haven't any notion of being married before Paul goes back. Nor has Paul. And when and if I get married, Aunt Pauline, I have a home of my own to get married from."

"Oh, I know. I know, darling! I just thought it might not be so—well, embarrassing all around to have it here. It's your wedding, of course."

"But there isn't going to be any wedding."

"Well, you have to decide that. It just seems to me that you can't withhold things from the boys who are risking so much. And, after all, there's no real reason to wait, is there? I thought you'd be pleased that I wasn't being a jealous, possessive mother!"

---

She tried to laugh and succeeded in sounding faintly amused and indulgently friendly.

"I'm flattered," Eliza said. "All the same, there isn't going to be any wedding now. And I'll have to run if I make that train."

She escaped. But on the train, she thought she was going to be sick. Then a wild laughter took possession of her. If I'd missed this train, I'd have been married before the next one! she thought.

There was still the meeting with her mother to be gone through, the detailed account of the day, the description of what Stella had worn, the easing of the awful anxiety to know that had grown to something like a mania in her mother's weary heart. She went through it gaily, even making her mother laugh. But she didn't tell her about Paul's outrageous behavior.

When she went to the office next morning Miss Hovis eyed her sharply and said, "Eliza, what's the matter with you? You look as if you were headed for a nervous breakdown!"

She laughed. "Oh, I just spent a week end with the family. It always gets me down."

"You know, it always startles me to realize you've got a family," Miss Hovis said. "You have such an unattached, self-sufficient air. What's your family like?"

"What are they like?" Eliza repeated slowly. "I'm afraid it would take a book to tell you that. My father's president of the Griggs Tool and Die Works, a big shot and a bedrock conservative. I live with my mother, as you know. She's not the Griggs type; she's gay and very good-looking and likes to play around. I walk on a tightrope between them and sometimes I lose my balance. I lost it yesterday, which gives me this dragged-out look today, I'm afraid."

Miss Hovis was silent for a moment. In the three years Eliza had been here she had never told Miss Hovis this much about herself, and her sudden grim though brief account startled Miss Hovis. But finally she gave her little grunt of a laugh and said, "You look to me more like the tightrope itself. Look out, or you'll get drawn too fine and snap! How would you like a couple of weeks off?"

"No, thanks. This is where I get my breath." She began to type rapidly.

That night, at the table, Eliza's mother said suddenly and reproachfully, "Why didn't you tell me, darling?"

"Tell you what?"

"About their coming to the St. Regis?"

"Don't talk riddles, mother. What do you mean?"

Her mother got up and went to the living room, came back with a newspaper. And there it was, an announcement that Mr. and Mrs. Edward Griggs had taken an apartment at the St. Regis for two months.

"I didn't know it," Eliza said slowly.

"But you must have! You spent all day Sunday with them. You mean, don't you, that you didn't tell me because you were afraid I'd make a nuisance of myself?" Her mother looked at her reproachfully, as if Eliza had somehow betrayed her, and said no more. This was more foreboding than wild grief or anger.

At nine Paul phoned. "Been missing me, my sweet?"

"No," she said, and hung up.

He called every day after that. He suggested coming up for Sunday, but she told him sharply that she was busy.

It was on the next Tuesday that Stella walked into the office. She came in in her mink jacket and moss-green suit and hat, and said, "Eliza, I'm not going to take any more of this. If you don't see that it's stopped, I'm going to do something pretty drastic about it."

"What are you talking about?"

"You know very well what I'm talking about. I'm not going to be driven out of my own hotel."

"Who's driving you out?" Eliza asked.

"Julia—or she's trying to. She comes to the St. Regis every day for lunch, with the most awful people. And every time I come in, her whole table begins to laugh. She's been there every day this week. She can make a fool of herself all she wants to, but she's not going to make a fool of me. After all, Eliza, I'm married to your father, and I intend to stay married to him."

"It's a public dining room, isn't it? After all, Stella, I'm not a jailer."

"Well, you'd better be. I should think you'd have some consideration for your father—he's been good enough to take money from all these years. If you can't keep her home where she belongs, then I shall take steps."

"What steps?" Eliza asked coolly.

"Never mind. All you need to know is that I shall take them. You know quite well that you can keep her away if you want to."

"I didn't even know she had been there. And I haven't taken any money from my father since I've had this job, as you know. What my mother takes was settled by the courts and by father. It seems a legal matter and nothing to get personal about. But I'll see that mother doesn't come to the St. Regis again—if I get something in return."

"In return?" Stella asked.

"Yes. I want you to get dad to take two weeks somewhere where it's quiet—the cottage, anywhere. He's tired."

"Don't be ridiculous, Eliza! Ned's perfectly well. And I don't see any reason to bargain with you. All the right happens to be on my side. I just came to warn you and I'm not fooling, either."

"All right. You've warned me. I guess that's all there is to this conversation, then."

Stella's smooth blondness seemed ruffled for an instant, her blue eyes darkened, but she laughed and said, "Good-by, then, darling!" and walked out of the office.

Then Eliza put on her things and went home. As she went up in the elevator, walked down the hall toward the apartment, her heart seemed to stir, come alive through the familiar beats of love and pity. Oh, mother, mother! her heart protested. How

"Inside Story" of a Good Meal

It's no secret that a good meal should also look good.
But that's only the beginning!
How can you be sure—even before you serve them—that foods will taste good?
How can you be certain you haven't "cooked away" vitamins and other health qualities?
Or that these properties haven't been impaired by storage or transit?
Food authorities* say—Trust foods in cans...and the pictures below tell the "inside story."

*For example, see Aug. 10, 1944 "Journal of Nutrition"

What an appetizing array of good things to eat—corn chowder, spinach, whole small onions, sliced tongue, fruit cocktail, cookies, tea—"and they all came out of a can!"

PROPER "UPBRINGING" is a big part of the care given to foods that go into cans. Many modern canneries actually control their vegetables and fruits all the way from seed to harvest. Then, at the peak of their perfection, they're popped into cans and scientifically cooked—with flavors, minerals, and vitamins lastingly sealed in. No wonder you serve canned foods proudly!

THE SAME GOOD CARE is also given foods such as meats and fish. Each steel-and-tin can is really a miniature "pressure cooker" that captures and holds the fine flavors you want. And how convenient it is to have a wide variety of flavorful meats and tasty fish always at hand—in cans!

THANKS TO THE CAN, dozens of fine fruits and vegetables are never "out of season"—no matter where you may live. And every time you open a can, you know the food inside has had safe protection from farm to table. Processed canned foods don't have to be stored under refrigeration.

FOODS IN CANS ARE

SAFE from dirt, germs, odors.

SAFE from air, light, moisture.

SAFE even after a can is opened—because, in the canning process, both the can and its contents are sterilized. Simply cover the top and place in the refrigerator.

NO OTHER CONTAINER PROTECTS LIKE THE CAN

Dream-Honeymoon Comes True

Home at last! "Let's have that honeymoon, darling." The girls packed for me and tucked in my bottle of Jergens Lotion. "For soft hands," they said. Jergens is by far the favorite way to sweet, soft hands. Hollywood Stars use Jergens Lotion, 7 to 1.

Now more effective than ever—thanks to wartime research. Jergens skin scientists now make Jergens Lotion even finer. "Hands feel softer," women said after testing this even more effective Jergens. "Protects my hands longer."

Every day joyous! Loving women, remember—Jergens Lotion still contains those 2 ingredients so "special" for skin-softening, they're just what many doctors use. Now in the stores—this postwar Jergens Lotion—same bottle—still 10¢ to $1.00 (plus tax). No oiliness; no sticky feeling.

could you? What can I say to you? What can I do?

She walked in to the sound of voices and tea things making a faint tinkle. She felt a faint relief at the reprieve. It was no reprieve. A stranger sat in the deep crimson chair, a teacup in his hand. He seemed to be resting there, so deep in the chair he was, so relaxed his long gaunt figure. She had never seen so thin a man. He looked up and saw her and something wild, frightened, sweet yet violent swept through her.

"Hello, Eliza," he said. He had got to his feet, put the teacup down. She wouldn't have known him, except for his voice and his eyes. Even his eyes were different. But his voice saying, "Hello, Eliza," was as familiar as her own skin.

"Hello, Adrian," she said, just looking at him, not putting out her hand or anything.

"I've had some trouble finding you," he said. "You seem to have moved about."

Yes, his voice was just the same, exactly the same. "But you're so thin," she said tactlessly, inadequately.

"Isn't he?" her mother put in quickly. "I made the sandwiches extra thick, too—but he still seems too thin. I've asked him to stay for dinner, though, and it's not too late to get a steak, if there's points enough."

"If you don't mind, Mrs. Griggs, I thought I might take Eliza out to dinner."

"Oh, of course! Of course! . . . This is a young man who knows his own mind, I can see that, darling! Wherever did you pick him up? I've been prying for half an hour and haven't found out a thing about him. Go make yourself pretty, dear!"

"She's all right as is," Adrian said. "Could we go now, Eliza?"

Eliza hesitated. There were the things she had to say to her mother. She shouldn't leave her alone here tonight. But she found herself saying, "Yes, of course."

She was aware of her mother's eyes on her, too probing, too knowledgeable, too excited. But Adrian picked up a topcoat, slid into it and they were moving out of the apartment, down the hall to the elevator.

In the elevator he said, "Is there some-place quiet near by?"

"Yes, just around the corner."

They walked out into the street and around the corner to a little basement restaurant with booths, found an empty booth, sat facing each other across the clothless table. For a moment they said nothing, just sat looking at each other.

Then he said, "But I never asked you to grow up so much, Eliza." There was sadness in the quiet words, a touch of bitterness because years had gone by and swallowed up their youth.

"It's not real. It's just outside," she said.

"No, I can see it's real. Did you have to put your hair up?"

"It's the mode."

"I always think of you with your hair down to your shoulders."

"I didn't know that you thought of me at all."

"No, I suppose you didn't. That was the idea, that you shouldn't."

"Whose idea?"

"My idea. It didn't turn out as I expected in the beginning, Eliza. I was offered the job in Rotterdam and it seemed a good thing to do at the time. I'm still a Dutch citizen, you know."

"No, I didn't know."

"I will be an American in time, I expect. Though I don't know, Eliza—I found I was only a Dutch citizen when it happened."

"You've been—fighting?"

"In my way. Not with a gun—not much, at any rate. I printed a paper. It's been a long pull for the Dutch. You have nothing left to offer a woman after a while. It's just getting from day to day, that is all. No future in it, nothing but getting through each day. It wasn't the way I planned it—it was just the way it was."

"You're so thin," she said with a sudden soft passion.

"I'm well enough. I'm alive." He spoke so quietly, and yet as he said those words so gently, so undramatically, she felt her own life surge all through her in a shouting tide. All the years dropped away, all the time of walking a tightrope, and she was free to walk wheresoe'er she would.

"Alive." She repeated the word softly. Then: "You should have let me know."

He shoved his plate to one side, as if he couldn't think of food just now, smiled at her with sudden warmth, as one asking pardon. "Yes, I should have let you know," he admitted. "I thought I had no right, you see. I thought it was all something I had no

Ask Any Woman

BY MARCELENE COX

GIVING the frosting dish into eager, waiting hands is one of the joys of being a mother.

Married life needs an occasional change of key; things so trivial as a wife trying a new hair-do or a husband learning to play bridge may furnish the modulating note.

Bliss: A little girl's face under a new umbrella.

Self-pity in a woman is as nauseating as very cheap perfume.

Question from a child: "How many helpings of kittens does a mother cat have?"

The way a young girl wears her hair should never suffer parental interference. I can still remember what my father said, even the spot where he stood, when he told me I couldn't have short hair.

If a woman has daughters, one disadvantage that goes along with keeping her figure down is that she may not always get to wear her own clothes.

Perhaps the tire shortage has kept many a girl from marrying the wrong person; you never really know a man until you have seen his reaction to a blowout.

Note to brides: Just because he tries the door after you tell him you have locked up is no sign he doubts your word; it's his moment of being master of the house.

Every woman should occasionally hear a few strains of the sweetest music on earth: the sound of another woman in the kitchen.

What most parents need is the child's-eye view.

Children, all eyes and ears and gulping in everything around them, should be brought up with parents who get along.

There's a definite maleness about even the way a boy runs a vacuum sweeper: straight across and back and forth; while a girl's pattern is as erratic as the path of someone lost in a woods.

Before he even swallows a bite a child can be filled to the brim with injunctions such as "Now eat everything on your plate," or "This will be good for you."

Our children worried the first night the family cat stayed away from her young until we assured them she was only breaking the kittens of their two-o'clock feeding.

Freshman's description of his Illinois home: "A little white cottage with a concubine climbing up on the roof."

Having "taboos" in the conversation of a family heightens curiosity just like the old-fashioned shut-up parlor.

An ideal mother is not one whose achievements are ideal, but one who has ideals to achieve.

right to ask you to share. I thought of you as so young, with your hair still down."

"Why did you come now, then?"

"I don't know. I had to. I'm here raising some money. All of a sudden, nothing seemed important but that I see you, see if I'd dreamed you, see if you were the same, if you were married. Just see you."

"And now I don't seem the same."

"No, not quite. It doesn't matter, though. You know, Eliza, it's strange, but it seems better not to have you so young. In the first minute, it was a shock—but now it seems better. I don't know why I thought you couldn't share what I've been experiencing—I don't just know why. It was just a feeling one gets over there. What has been hurting you so terribly much, Eliza?"

Why, just with his asking her that, should the hurt dissolve, melt into nothingness? Where was the burden gone? And how was it possible to have years not matter, have life take up exactly where you put it down? How was it possible to be known like this, just as she had been known without speech at seventeen?

"I don't know. Or I do know, but I don't feel like telling—it doesn't matter," she said. "Your grandmother—is she safe?"

"She's safe. She's dead."

"Oh. And the house—the house with all the Dresden?"

"It's gone. It's a hole in the ground. . . . I should have known. I did know, maybe. You knew too much about life when you were a child. I should have known you'd take life hard. Is it your mother?"

"No. Not really, though sometimes it has seemed so. No, it's as it has been with you. It's getting through each day, just getting through, without any future. It's feeling yourself get smaller and smaller, because it has nothing to grow on—not even a cause. There has to be something that's your own. Or does there? Sometimes you get to feeling that all that matters now is to be selfless, that you've lost the right to anything just for you. But when I think that, I feel as if I'm already dead. You see, it wasn't hard, none of it was hard till I got to be twenty. You told me to hurry and get to be twenty. I did. And nothing was too hard then. Everything was just the same. My mother was the same—she loves my father still, you see, and life is very hard for her. I loved her and she needed me and I stayed with her. I love my father too. But I had you to think about. Oh, I was a child, I know! I was dreaming as a child dreams, I suppose. I made you very special, more special than you were, perhaps. I got to be twenty—and nothing happened. Silence. Just silence. And suddenly I was twenty-four. At least, you've worked for freedom. That is better than an emptiness four years deep."

How shameless of me! she thought. And yet that was part of the miracle, that she could sit here and say whatever she liked to him, that she didn't have to be ashamed, because his very being here meant that it was important to him too.

"An emptiness four years deep," he repeated. "Yes, that is it. That's the way it has been. I was wrong. You will have to forgive me, Eliza."

She didn't answer. She just smiled at him, her eyes blurred with sudden tears, saying in silence that it was all right, it was all right now.

"Let's go," he said. "Let's get out of here."

They left their dinner half eaten, rose, paid at the little cashier's cage, walked out into the sharp autumn night. They walked along the street, not knowing where they went, just walked, two tall young people who were not so young as they should have been.

"I'll earn a living again, in time, you know," he said once.

"I've got a job in a literary agency," she answered.

In another block he said, "I didn't know I'd ever feel as rested as this again."

"Yes, I know," she answered. She did know. There was no tiredness in her, only

Early and Advanced Signs of "TISSUE STARVATION"

ADVANCED SIGNS

XEROSIS CONJUNCTIVAE. Note thickening and discoloration of the whites of the eyes. An example of an advanced "Tissue Starvation," producible by a prolonged lack of vitamins.

"MOSAIC PAVEMENT" SKIN. A doctor's term for "Tissue Starvation" where skin is excessively parched, crackled and crinkled because of an advanced vitamin deficiency.

ADVANCED TISSUE STARVATION. There is a proven relationship between certain vitamin shortages and swollen, tender, bleeding gums—tongue and lip lesions.

EARLY SIGNS

USUAL VITAMIN DEFICIENCY of eye tissues. Eye whites should not be "muddy" or cloudy-looking when in perfect health, but bluish-white and with a translucent clarity.

ROUGHENED SKIN—possible anywhere on the body but most often found on thighs and arms—can be, and frequently is, caused by a mild, chronic "Tissue Starvation" for vitamin A.

LIPS AND GUMS. A continuing "Tissue Starvation"—even though relatively mild—can result in tender gums and minor but visible lesions of the lips and tongue.

"TISSUE STARVATION"
is producible by a lack of vitamins in the living cells of your body

The Signs of Vitamin Deficiency often appear first in Eyes, Skin, Tongue and Mouth

POPULAR opinion in America has fallen into a deep error about vitamins and what vitamins can do for you. Contrary to popular belief, vitamins are not merely a daily diet need. Vitamins are part and parcel of all body tissues. If you lack vitamins—if you haven't enough of them—signs of tissue deficiency may appear in your body itself.

You can have a vitamin deficiency—a "Tissue Starvation"—even if you are overweight. And medical opinion holds that thousands of Americans—men as well as women—DO show signs of "Tissue Starvation" producible by a lack of vitamins in the body.

Now, to avoid misunderstanding on this important point, please look again at the two columns of untouched photographs of "Tissue Starvation" above.

Look at the left-hand column. These are advanced cases, chosen from a population group long subject to severe vitamin deficiencies. They in no sense show conditions usual to American life. They are reproduced only to demonstrate that there is a direct and proven connection between such signs and a shortage of vitamins.

Look for the Early Signs!

But the second column (the right-hand column) represents tissue changes found by doctors in early, or common, cases of "Tissue Starvation."

Look for these signs in yourself. Look at your eyes, your lips, your gums in the mirror.

Run your hand over your skin—over your thighs and upper arms—you may even find rough spots around your nose and mouth. These signs, of course, may result from such conditions as irritation, or infection, or other forms of malnutrition, but "Tissue Starvation" due to vitamin deficiency is a frequent and basic cause.

Under usual circumstances, the way to help guard against this form of "Tissue Starvation" is by taking One-A-Day (brand) Multiple Vitamins. You get all the known needed vitamins in One-A-Day (brand) Multiple Vitamin Capsules—yes, they bring you vitamins A, $B_1$, $B_2$, C and D, plus Niacin Amide, Calcium Pantothenate and $B_6$. ### Special Conditioning Factors

Body tissues need the protection of extra vitamins as a result of certain conditioning factors, such as the following:

|---|---|
| Diarrhea | Alcoholism |
| Food allergy | Over-indulgence |
| Pregnancy | Reducing diets |
| Certain digestive disturbances | Physical overwork |
| | Diabetes |

When these factors are present, your daily intake of vitamins may need to be increased.

THE MILES PLAN
FOR HEALTH PROTECTION

1. PROPER DIET. Vitamin deficiencies may accrue gradually in the body tissues throughout your entire life. So try to eat a balanced diet every day from now on.

2. PROTECTIVE VITAMINS. Take one capsule of One-A-Day Multiple Vitamins every day.

3. CONDITIONING FACTORS. Certain conditions and habits increase vitamin needs. Protect yourself then by taking extra vitamins.

4. SEE YOUR DOCTOR—if you think you have lesions—as above—that indicate vitamin deficiency.

what comfort she could in André and the Mr. Hansons of her world?

"Mother," she began, but she had no chance to tell her mother. Her father was coming into the room. For an instant her heart knew panic. It would be too much for her mother, too terribly much. Her heart could not stand this shock.

But her father, without a word for her, had come over to the bed, dropped down on his knees by the bed, put his face against her mother's. "Julia! Julia!" he said.

Eliza walked out of the room, did not look back. Grandma was sewing. She looked stern and disapproving.

"It's all right, grandma," Eliza said.

"I hope so," grandma said stiffly.

It was two hours later when her father came down, bade Grandma Goodspeed a rather formal good-by, said, "Will you walk to the station with me, Eliza?" But he hardly said a word all the way down the hill, up Main to Railroad Street. It was when they stood on the cindered platform that he said, "Your mother says you are not marrying Paul."

"Paul? Of course not. I told you that long ago."

"You're—you're sure this Vandermeer—is that the name?—is the one, Eliza?"

"Yes, I'm sure."

"Then stick to him, my dear."

"I will. Thanks for coming down, father."

"Thanks for calling me, Eliza."

And that was all they said. He got on the little local and went away. That, she thought, walking back up the hill, was all she would probably ever know of this visit that had been for so many years so desperately important to her mother. To him, too, it well may have been.

It's strange, she said to herself, but now I'm cut off from them, I seem to love them more than I did. It's strange.

When she came into the house she heard at once her mother's voice from the kitchen. "Of course I feel well enough! I feel fine!" her mother was saying. "And I'm perfectly capable of making the stuffing for the turkey—good heavens, didn't you teach me how to cook, mother! Eliza and I have always done our own cooking. I suppose Cornelia and Will'll be here for dinner—anyone else? We ought to have a real crowd for that big a turkey! I think I'll call up Hanson—he'd appreciate a home-cooked dinner. Mind? He's the friend who brought us down."

"Julia, have you lost your wits? Hanson, indeed! What was Ned Griggs doing down here, may I ask?"

"Ned?" For an instant her mother's voice stilled. Then she laughed. "Oh, we're still friends, mother. . . . I think you'd like Hanson; he's very free and easy, but he's a good scout. . . . Oh, there you are, Eliza. Get your father off all right?"

"Just!" Eliza said.

As calm as if this had been just any visit! And yet, Eliza remembered, wasn't that the way she had felt after she had come in and seen Adrian sitting there with her mother? As if she were suddenly strong enough for anything, anything at all the world could offer? Just seeing him, wasn't that the way she had felt? Then she laughed, a sudden, clear, happy laugh, and said, "Sit down, grandma—this is our dressing!"

And when at seven the phone rang, she went to it quickly and said very steadily and surely, "Yes, everything's all right. . . . Yes, I can. I'll be there. . . . Yes, three days ought to be enough. . . . No—everything's all right. . . . God love you, darling. Good night."

Babies plus matches make a sum in tragedy. This little boy will be a burn casualty unless his mother keeps rules against fire and scalding hazards.

Prevention and Treatment of Burns

BY DR. HERMAN N. BUNDESEN

President, Chicago Board of Health

EVERY year thousands of children are painfully burned, and many die as a result, in accidents that should not and need not have happened. Scalding liquids, boiling grease, forbidden matches and bonfires, electrical appliances carelessly used—these are the chief causes of accidental burns, which injure as many children as all other accidents combined. The number of burn accidents that are unavoidable or caused by willful mischief is tragically small; usually, someone's ignorance or thoughtlessness is to blame.

Burns don't often happen to children of mothers who are aware of the hazard themselves and instruct the children and other members of the household (including "sitters" and cleaning women) accordingly, taking care to observe and enforce necessary precautions all the time. When, in spite of everything that can be done to prevent it, children do get burned, mothers who know enough to do the right things, and not to do the wrong things, may save hours of suffering and prevent ugly scars. They may even save life.

The seriousness of a burn depends on how deep into the skin it penetrates and how wide an area it covers. Mild "first-degree" burns, which cause redness but not blistering, need not be considered serious unless they cover more than one tenth of the body's surface—the foot and lower leg or an equivalent area. Minor burns can be treated satisfactorily at home. Quickly the burned part should be immersed in warm water; this stops the pain caused by exposure of injured nerve endings to air. Then a thick paste of sodium bicarbonate (ordinary baking soda) and water may be spread over the area. This can be renewed as needed until tenderness subsides—usually within twenty-four hours. Burn salves made of gentian violet or butein picrate are useful to have on hand in the medicine cabinet for prompt relief in case of minor burns. The combined anesthetic and germicidal action of these preparations eases pain and prevents later infection.

But no greasy salve or ointment should be applied to a burn that blisters. The sticky mass must be removed before proper treatment can be started, and often its removal is painful and wastes valuable time. The likelihood that ruptured blisters may become a site of infection (one of the great dangers in burn cases) makes it desirable to get the doctor as quickly as possible for big, blistering burns. Meanwhile, emergency measures are aimed chiefly at controlling pain. Clothes sticking to burned flesh should be left alone; attempts to remove them will only add to the child's agony and may even do further damage to the skin. When burns are extensive the child may be put, clothes and all, into a tub of warm water. Deep burns on exposed parts such as the hands or face may be covered loosely with a clean handkerchief soaked in water and baking soda.

In any case of deep or extensive burns, however, the threat is not only from the burn itself and the infection that often follows

GRATEFUL young mothers from Maine to California tell us that Doctor Bundesen's baby booklets have been of the greatest help to them in caring for their own babies. The first eight booklets cover your baby's first eight months. They sell for 50 cents. The second series of booklets covers the baby's health from nine months to two years—seven booklets for 50 cents. The booklets will be sent monthly; be sure to tell us when you want the first booklet. A complete book on the care of the baby, a necessary supplement to the monthly booklets, OUR BABIES, No. 1345, is 25 cents. Think of the improvements that are helping modern mothers raise healthier babies. For instance, wider knowledge of infant nutrition, strict care in sterilizing babies' utensils, and - not the least - the introduction of prepared baby foods.

but also from the shock that accompanies the injury. In shock, all the body's processes are slowed down, often dangerously; sometimes the circulation is so depressed by shock that transfusions of plasma or whole blood are needed to save life. The outward signs of shock are extreme pallor, clammy skin, weak pulse and labored, shallow breathing. When these symptoms appear on the heels of a bad burn, keep the child warm by wrapping him in a blanket or putting him to bed with a hot-water bottle or heating pad, and keep him lying down to prevent strain on weakened functions. Then tell the doctor to hurry!

In recent years, and especially because of experience gained during the war, doctors have perfected new methods of treating second-degree (blistering) and third-degree (still deeper) burns. Only a few years ago, it was commonly believed that burns involving more than a third of the body's surface almost always resulted in death, but today men have actually been saved and returned to active duty after suffering burns which covered three quarters of their bodies. One of the latest treatments consists of spraying the burned area with a combination of aniline dyes. This forms a hard crust over the burn, relieving pain and preventing the loss of body fluids by leakage through the damaged skin surface. At the same time, these substances act to kill invading bacteria. When it is undertaken promptly, this method aids the body in replacing burned skin naturally, so that the necessity for skin-grafting operations, except in the most severe cases, is greatly reduced. Thus, whenever a child is burned on the face or hands, mothers need not fear that disfiguring scars are inevitable. If swift steps are taken to get the child to a doctor or hospital, the chances of permanent scarring are usually slight.

Of course calmness at the time of the accident is paramount. If clothing catches fire and blazes quickly, the youngster's impulse will be to run away. Nothing could be worse; this fans the flames and makes serious burns more likely. Instead, the child should be rolled in a rug or coat or blanket—anything that will smother the fire—and kept lying on the floor instead of standing up, to diminish the possibility of breathing in fumes and burning the air passages.

Most important of all, however, are the rigid precautions that keep fires from happening and keep children away from burn hazards. Here are the rules that you must follow every day of the year to make sure your home won't be the scene of a tragic burn accident, or your child the victim:

1. Eliminate fire hazards and observe fire-safety precautions. Your fire department will tell you what these are.

2. Keep pot handles turned inward on the stove, out of reach of curious fingers. Don't leave a young child alone in the kitchen when the stove is on. Cups of hot coffee and bowls of hot soup must always be set in—away from the edge of the table and the danger of overturning.

3. Never leave a child alone with appliances such as a heater, toaster, waffle iron or ironer. Keep these out of reach when in use.

4. Teach early and often that faucets and radiators and light bulbs—anything in the house that contains or develops heat—are hurtful and mustn't be played with.

5. Keep matches away from children and children away from matches! Any infractions of this rule have to be handled with unrelenting sternness. Playmates who disobey must be banished, no matter how harsh it seems. When tragedy strikes, it's too late to be strict.

TOMBOY

fishing and played baseball and shot marbles as an equal, as one of them. She couldn't dance with them now, smiling coyly the way the other girls did, pretending to be enchanting—pretending to enchant. There was Joe Crane, who only yesterday had called her a stinker because she had beat him in a race to school by hurdling a hedge; there was Bob Hendy, who had put her out at first, and laughed at her mud-spattered face when she got to her feet after the slide; there was Skeet ——

"Hi, Skeet," she said.

He came away from the pillar against which he had been stiffly leaning, running one finger between his neat white collar and his reddening neck, watching her warily.

"Don't look so scared," she said, laughing. "It's me."

"Migosh." The first syllable was deep and resonant, the second a piping shriek. "It don't seem like you."

"Well, you're pretty tricked out yourself!"

He kept staring at her uncomfortably. "You gonna do any dancing?" he asked.

"Me?" She glanced at the stag line—Joe Crane, Bob Hendy —— "Don't be a dope!"

He grinned then, relaxed. "Well, look," he said. "I've gotta dance with Beth. I promised ma. But after that, what do you say we sneak outa here? I heard the frogs when I came by. There must be a million of 'em!"

Frankie smiled slowly. "You're on," she said. "I'll meet you back by the kitchen door in an hour—and I betcha my new set of hooks against your knife, I catch more frogs than you do."

"Well," he said. "Well, I'd just as soon make a smaller bet. It's just the idea of it, to have something to go for. It don't necessarily have to be as big as my knife."

When he had gone off to dance with Beth, Frankie edged away to the wall and sat down. She watched Beth, who could hardly dance three steps with one boy before another cut in, and marveled at the look of happiness on her face, the look of triumph. That was the way Frankie felt when she had hooked a bigger fish than Skeet, when she had caught more frogs in the marsh. But because boys kept crowding around her! Why, when Frankie shot marbles she had every boy in the neighborhood watching her, some rooting for her and others razzing her, but all of them admiring her uncanny skill.

The same boys who hardly seemed to know she was here tonight, except to drop a careless "Hi, Frankie," as they passed. The same boys—but different: their faces clean and their voices softened down and their manners all spruced up and shining; their eyes funny when they looked at the girls, bright and warm and glad, as if they were looking at marshmallow-butter-pecan sundaes with double scoops of ice cream. That was the trouble with dances and parties—that was why she hated them. They changed everybody and made you feel like a stranger.

She wasn't used to being alone, out of things. She liked to be in the middle of what was going on, not just sitting on the side lines this way—a droop in a white dress, with feet that seemed suddenly too big and hands that she didn't know where to put.

Somebody's mother passed by and patted her on the shoulder, telling her she looked lovely and asking her why she wasn't dancing. She murmured something, and the mother went away, but all at once the most awful feeling of panic hit her.

She was always going to be out of things. It wasn't only now—this party. It was something that had been growing and growing and would get bigger all the time: the girls being happy and triumphant because the boys crowded around them, and the boys looking at the girls as though they were marshmallow-butter-pecan sundaes, and Frankie not in it at all.

"All alone?" Another mother spoke to her, and Frankie could hear the pity in her voice.

Sure—why not? I don't care about this party stuff. I think it's dopey. There was a time when she might have said that, but now she said, "Oh, no, thank you, I'm not alone. I'm just—waiting for my escort. There he is over there."

She looked around wildly, wanting to convince this woman that she wasn't alone, out of it, a girl to be pitied. She looked at all the unfamiliarly clean, polite faces of boys who had so recently laughed at her and clapped her on the back and called her a stinker, and she knew it was no use. They would think she was nuts. They would think ——

"Which one, dear?" the woman asked with kindly interest, following her glance. "Bobby Stanton?"

Bobby Stanton, for whom she had once had to bait a hook because, although he was a star basketball player and very rugged, he couldn't stand worms! Bobby Stanton, winking at her from the stag line the way he might have winked at his kid brother, and then looking on past her, his eyes lighting up at the sight of a little redheaded girl on the dance floor—Deedee Vines, who couldn't even throw a ball straight, and gave little squeals when she ran.

"No," Frankie said, and then she got to her feet. "There he is—that one."

She went toward him quickly, before she could think, trying to smile like a girl who was part of all this—a girl who had an escort waiting for her. He wouldn't know she was really out of it, different from the others. He wouldn't know, because he had never seen her before in his life.

"Hello," she said, and then she saw that he was quite old—twenty, maybe—and she was frightened. "Who—who are you?" she inquired, though this was not at all what she had meant to say next.

He laughed and guided her to a chair, steering her expertly by her elbow. "I'm Henry Baker," he said. He sat down, stretching long, white-trousered legs across the floor, and looked expectantly at her out of bright blue eyes.

She tried to think what to say, how to explain herself, but she had had no experience with subterfuge. "I told somebody you were my escort," she said. "I had to pretend to know you."

He nodded wisely. "Trying to make somebody jealous, eh?"

"Jealous?" She gave him a puzzled frown. "No, it was just a lady who—it was because everybody else ——" But how could she explain it? "Oh, skip it," she said, and grinned.

He grinned back. "It doesn't matter anyway," he said. "Whatever the reason was, I'm glad you're here."

She looked around the room. She was part of it now, like the others. She was sitting with a boy—a man, really—and nobody had to be sorry for her any more.

"My gosh," she said to Henry Baker, "you don't even know my name."

"Sure I do. You're Diana."

She shook her head, and the smooth, gentle waves her mother had coaxed into her hair sprang instantly, as though relieved, into flyaway curls. "You have the wrong girl. My name's Frances—Frankie, most people call me." She wrinkled her short, lightly freckled nose. "Diana? I don't think ——"

He laughed again, getting to his feet and pulling at her hand. "Come along a minute, I want to show you something."

She did not ask him where. This was all right, within her experience. She was always going along with somebody to see something: a robin's nest up in a tree, frogs in the marsh, a pitcher's new fast curve.

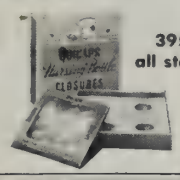
Henry took her only as far as the library, to a table where a small bronze statue stood. It was the statue of a girl with short, curly hair and strong, slim arms and legs and a bow in her hand.

"This is Diana," Henry said. "You look just like her."

"Oh." She walked up to the statue and examined it carefully. "I do, a little," she said finally, gravely. "How did you ever happen to notice it?"

He smiled, his eyes crinkling until only two bright specks of blue showed. "I notice all kinds of things—especially nice things. You, for instance, out of that whole roomful of girls in there. I knew you were nice."

She frowned again. "Don't talk silly," she said. "You didn't even know I was there until I came after you."



"Smart mother I've got!"

AT RADIO CITY, NEW YORK

He sat down on the edge of the table, swinging one leg. "How old are you, Diana?" he asked her.

She said, "Sixteen," and then wondered why—because she would not be sixteen for almost a year, and she never told lies.

"It can't be so. It isn't possible."

She thought he meant about her age, and embarrassment for the lie flooded her face with color. "What isn't possible?"

"You. I've never known a girl like you," he said. "You're grand, Diana. And that's not talking silly, now. I mean it."

She was relieved that he believed she was sixteen, and she approved of the firm strength with which he took her hand—none of your cold-fish handshakes. He was all right, this Henry Baker, a good guy.

"Okay," she said crisply.

He gave her his eye-crinkling smile. "You don't talk around things much, do you? Or flutter your eyelashes, or smile coyly, or ——" He paused, shaking his head. "And with all of it, you're so pretty!"

"Pretty?" She made a soft little sound of scorn through her nose. "I thought you weren't going to be silly."

"I'm not." He looked at her, his bright blue eyes earnest, and she tried the word over in her mind—pretty—like a new taste. "Do you think anybody'd bother to make a statue of you, Diana," he said, "if you weren't pretty?"

"But it isn't really of me. I'm not ——"

"It could be, couldn't it? You said yourself it looked like you. Do you really not know how pretty you are?"

She didn't understand why she could not answer, why her throat felt dry and painful. Still holding her hand, he put his head back and stared at the ceiling and said quietly:

"When I think
That you were in the world a year ago,
What time I sat alone here in the snow
And saw no footprints, heard the silence sink
No moment at your voice ——"

He stopped and smiled at her again. "Nice, isn't it?"

"What—what is it?"

"It's part of one of Elizabeth Browning's Sonnets from the Portuguese—modernized a bit. Do you like poetry?"

"I don't know," she said.

She didn't know. Always before, she had thought it was sissy, mushy stuff that made no sense, but the way Henry said it—that quiet way, as though he were just talking, telling her something, though she wasn't sure what it was he was telling her ——

"I'll lend you some books of it," he said, "and then after you've read them we can talk about the poems. We do that in the dorms at college sometimes—it's fun."

They were going to see each other again after tonight and talk about poetry, and it wasn't sissy—not if boys did it at college. She felt a kind of excitement rising in her, and it was a little like the feeling she got when she saw the flash of a fish in the pond, near her line, only not altogether like that.

"We'll have a good summer," he said. "My family's moved here permanently, you know, and I'll be home the whole vacation."

"I'm glad." She held out her hand to him, because she felt warm and friendly and wanted to shake on it.

He took her brown fingers in his hard clasp, looking at her, and pulled her slowly toward him. "Diana," he said softly.

Someone opened the library door, and a girl's voice said, "Oh—pardon me!"

Henry dropped Frankie's hand. "Hello, Claire," he said.

The girl's eyes narrowed on Frankie's face. Then she smiled up at Henry and laid her fingers on his arm. "It's our dance, isn't it?"

Frankie looked at them—at Henry, whose handclasp she liked very much, and at this girl who was about Henry's age, and whom she did not like at all. If he went away dancing with her, maybe he would not come back.

"Henry," she said quickly, "how about going frogging with us?"

The White Package with the Orange Band

It was the best fun she knew, and only a select few were ever invited to share it with her. A complete stranger had never been taken in before.

"Frogging?" Henry repeated.

Frankie nodded, holding her breath without knowing it, and then the girl called Claire laughed.

"Frogging"—she repeated the word incredulously between bursts of laughter. "What on earth is that?"

"We can always dance," Henry said. "This—I'd like to see what it is. You don't mind, do you, Claire? We'll have our dance later."

Skeet was waiting at the back door. "What happened to you?" he demanded. "You get stuck in there?" Then he saw Henry, and his mouth remained open on the last word.

"This is Henry Baker. He's coming along," Frankie explained laconically.

"Oh," Skeet said. He stood a moment, staring. Then he ran ahead of them, scaling the low hedge around the lawn. Frankie had to follow cautiously, her heels catching in the turf and her long dress swirling around her legs, Henry's fingers on her elbow.

"Listen, Diana," Henry said. "Will you meet me tomorrow? Tomorrow afternoon, at the north side of the bridge over the pond?"

She said, "Yes—yes, I will," and then something told her that she should not sound so eager, and she felt strange again, alone and uncertain, the way she had felt when she was sitting by herself on the edge of the dance floor.

She ran ahead of Henry, as Skeet had done, and when she reached her house she went into the bushes and took off her dress and then shinnied up the drainpipe in her underwear to her room. Soon she was back on the ground again, blue jeans rolled up, white shirt flapping, catching up to Skeet and Henry in a moment.

"Come on," she whispered. "Nobody saw me."

She was herself now, at home in a world she knew, comfortable and sure. She led them both, her legs free, the long grass cool and prickly against her skin. She ran, and they could not keep up with her. She could smell the marsh smell—mud and dank water and grasses and frogs—a familiar yet mysterious smell, having to do with all the adventure of childhood.

"Whoa!" Skeet called to her, the one word ranging from deep bass to falsetto. "Here we are."

She stopped and looked around quickly. They were on the edge of a small marsh, their feet already sunk in the wet earth. Before them, where the water deepened a little, a clouded moon revealed the immobile shapes of dozens of frogs, seemingly carved to the stones and lily pads where they sat. Only the loud, rhythmic gulping of their hoarse voices indicated that they were alive.

"Here's where we separate," Frankie whispered. "I'll take the other side." She glanced briefly at Henry. "You'd better come with me and watch awhile to see how."

There was a trick to catching frogs—a quiet trick of moving that Skeet would never learn, and a sense of timing, too, that was something like knowing the exact moment to swing at a baseball. Frankie caught a few small ones before Skeet caught any. She held them carefully by the legs, and then she dropped them into one of the barrels that she and Skeet kept hidden for the purpose.

"Want to try it now?" she asked Henry.

He looked down at his white trousers and started to speak, but just then Frankie saw the biggest frog she had ever come across, sitting alone on a small rock—like a king, she thought, not caring about anything. She forgot all about Henry. If she could catch that big fellow, he'd be a real prize.

A product of R. B. Semler, Inc.

She inched along soundlessly, making each movement careful, gentle, so that there would be no revealing plop of hand or knee on mud. She was so close that she could see the regular movement of the frog's throat, like the bulging and contracting of an Adam's apple in an old man's flabby neck. Now—now ——

But there was nothing under her hands. Eight feet away, the big frog sat on another rock, motionless, carved there, as though he had been there always. Frankie rose slowly and looked at him, and he looked back with his cold, beady supercilious stare.

All at once she wondered why she wanted to catch him. What for? She would drop him into the barrel with the others, and then she would compare the number she had caught with the number in Skeet's barrel, and she would have more, because she always did, and then they would let all the frogs go back into the marsh again. But it was fun, wasn't it? The excitement of trying to catch them, and Skeet's face when she had beat him again, and kidding him all the way home about how slow he was. It was fun.

She got to her feet, staring down at her mud-covered jeans, her blackened shirt. She looked at Henry, and then she looked quickly away again and went to the barrel and gave it a hard push that rolled it over on its side. After a minute a little frog leaped out, and then another, and another into the marsh.

"Hey, Skeet! I've had enough."

His muddy form rose from the other side of the marsh, and she sloshed across to meet him. "What's the matter?" he asked her.

The example which is followed is the one we set when we are off our guard. —MATTHEWMAN: Brevities. (H. T. Coates & Co.)

"We practically only just came. I didn't even have a chance to catch any."

"I didn't catch any either," she said. "It's not a good night for it, I guess."

He glanced at Henry, who was coming to join them, skirting the mud. "That guy ——" he began contemptuously.

"He has on white flannels," she broke in.

All at once she began to run, ignoring Skeet's shouted, "Hey! Hey, you coming fishing tomorrow, Frankie?" and Henry's "Wait, Diana. Wait a minute!"

As she ran, she tried to smooth down her hair and wipe her face on one clean patch of sleeve, although there was nobody there to see. It was that big one, she thought, looking so proud, like a king. He would have been humiliated if she had caught him; probably the other frogs would never have had any respect for him again. That was why she hadn't wanted to get him—that was it.

But then why, since she had let him go, was she crying over him? Why was she crying and running like this, when there was nothing to cry about or run away from—nothing at all?

She walked along the road to the pond, squinting a little to see into the distance. It was a fine afternoon for fishing—very still, and not too sunny. They would be biting today.

Skeet was already there, his line dangling limply in the water. She started to whistle to him. She went close to the railing and started to lean over and give their long, low whistle. But the railing was dirty. If she leaned against it, she would soil her dress. And if Skeet saw her he would ask her why she was up there instead of down at the pond fishing with him. And how could she tell him, when she did not really know herself?

She turned around and squinted into the distance. She thought what a good day it was for fishing. She thought that maybe she would slide down off the bridge and surprise Skeet, landing right beside him. She could borrow a piece of Skeet's line and one of his hooks. They would be biting today.

She turned back once and looked down at the pond again and gave a small sigh without knowing she did so. Then she crossed the bridge and went to meet Henry Baker.

TOWARD THE "BIG ONE"

reduced to penury; future generations are involved in the fate of the present one; the economy of the enemy becomes eternally dependent on that of the victors.

The permanent disarmament goes even farther. The potential war-making power of a state also depends on manpower, population and the size of its area. Therefore these must be reduced: the area by truncation—cutting off parts of it and awarding them to others—and the population by such devices as forced male labor, which reduces the birth rate, and economic policies resulting in famine. The peace is not considered won until the "war after the war" has accomplished the permanent exit from history of the defeated, as any power factor whatsoever.

All the victors in this war have followed this policy. When the Germans were, for a time, triumphant in Europe they transplanted industry and labor, pursued a policy of depopulation—by gas chambers or starvation—and reduced former enemy territories by truncation. The victorious Allies are doing the same things with greater or lesser thoroughness, the Russians as thoroughly as the Germans, the western Allies with only somewhat greater inhibitions.

But with whatever degree of energy or inhibition, this is the pattern of modern revolutionary warfare. Defeat means that a state passes out of history, as a great industrial or any other kind of power. The burden of defeat is borne by all the peoples of the vanquished, and by their posterity. Hence the frenzy with which the twentieth century war is waged, defeat being, in effect, the suicide of a society.

The outstanding historic fact about the modern war is that it reduces the number of independent states and enlarges the scope of the larger sovereignties. Each sovereignty in this world is One World within in its own area. The number of persons living, for instance, in the One World of the Soviet Union, in 1941, was estimated at 180,000,000. Since then all the Baltic states, part of Finland, a very large part of Poland and part of Rumania have disappeared wholly into the Soviet Union, increasing its population by many millions and its territory by thousands of square miles. But that is a superficial view of the picture. Actually all of Poland, enlarged by eastern Germany to the river Oder, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Rumania and Jugoslavia, enormous territories, inhabited by some 120,000,000 people, are being methodically and exclusively enmeshed in the Soviet Union, at least militarily and economically. Whatever domestic liberties they may eventually enjoy, it is quite clear that their sovereignty has gone forever in respect of two things: foreign policy and the right to make war. Their armies are an integral part of the Soviet military system; their foreign policies are no longer independent. The relinquishment of at least this amount of sovereignty is what the Soviets mean by a "friendly" neighbor.

THUS One World is actually in the making by the revolution of total war and total victory—or total defeat, its concomitant.

Leaving out of account, for a moment, the devices and methods by which this has been accomplished in expanding the One World of the Soviet Union, the gathering of many sovereignties into one in respect to war-making power is a genuine pacification process, and the only effective pacification process within the areas to which it applies. The states within the new Soviet sphere will hereafter be quite unable to wage national wars against each other, or as allies of any other great power.

This has always been the only means of permanent pacification. The pacification of North America was accomplished when the individual states relinquished to one common sovereignty all their foreign policy and war-making powers. The Civil War was the crucial test of the right of self-determination and secession and it was decisively negative. Had separate complete state sovereignties continued to exist, or several, or even two regional sovereignties, this country would probably have had as many American wars as there have been inter-European.

BUT the reduction of many units to five, four, three or two cannot possibly mean global pacification. Inevitably, that will mean at least one more "War of Survival"—i.e., of elimination. Whoever loses will pass under the sovereignty of the victor. Each war of the future is therefore bound to bring closer the One World under a single sovereignty. But any of the future threatens to destroy—according to great scientists—two thirds of mankind in the process, and in the best case to wipe out for centuries great civilizations.

One would think, therefore, that if the statesmen of the world were worth their salt, and the peoples had an aware sense of self-preservation, they would anticipate the results of the next war by realizing its inevitable aims now, and avoid it by winning it beforehand.

The concept of a world government is not tyrannous if sufficient checks and balances can be devised, as they certainly can be by men of good will and clear intellect. Obviously the jurisdiction of a world government must be confined to taking into itself the only two functions of national sovereign states which are incompatible with permanent world pacification: international policy, and war-making powers. Just two "rights" need to be taken from national states: the "right" to make wars against other national states, and the "right" to secede. No other rights should be taken away, and for the time being, at least, no other functions should be given a world authority, except to see that its authority in this sphere is not infringed.

All hopes for any sort of stable and prosperous economic life depend on this. No rational world or even national economy can create itself or be organized as long as national states live under the threat or possibility of war, for that possibility colors every economic program. Whether it is cheaper or more efficient to import food or rubber rather than grow the one on unsuitable soil or create the other by popular subsidies is a question that cannot be answered rationally at all, if there is a possibility of war. The terrible schisms between peoples and the ideological conflicts cannot be pacified as long as there is danger of war. For in view of that danger, ideas, too, become weapons, and back of all thought is the consideration of force. The American fear of communism is, in essence, a fear of the Red armies; the Soviet fear of capitalism is, in effect, fear of Anglo-American weapons—and of the quite uncapitalistic atomic bomb, which, in the case of one-world sovereignty, would never again be manufactured. There are atomic bombs at this moment in the possession of the American Army, but nobody is afraid they will be dropped on Detroit to break a strike or a lockout. Our country is policed, not always wisely or justly, but it is not policed with bombing planes, simply because it is all under one sovereignty—not many.

The Big Three can never maintain lasting peace. Only a Big One can do that. And the Big One will eventually be created, by the inevitable development of the revolution of modern war, by conquest and domination—if not by co-operative agreement. It is, of course, entirely possible—quite coldly to be taken into calculation—that the Big One will be the last spot, people, and man, on a planet exploding itself out of the firmament. Then, if anywhere in the universe there is a graveyard for finished stars, the earth's obituary may be: It died because its inhabitants, being endowed with brains to penetrate the secrets of all matter, preferred to perish rather than use them any further.

WHAT IS CIVILIZATION?

of the ego. Hence the grievous opposition of young and old: the old must transmit the moral code of the group, the young must attack it with an innovating, liberating passion in which the errors occasionally number less than the trials. The old provide stabilizing heredity, the young offer adaptive variation. The conflict is costly, everlasting and beneficent.

The school may also transmit the moral code, and seek to fashion character as well as to sharpen intellect; probably this is done better in Europe than in America, better in the formative than in the culminating epochs of a civilization.

Religion plays here a vital role: it warns the rampant ego of a surveillant unforgetting deity, and of eternal punishments; charms it with holy examples and the promise of endless rewards; and fortifies the unwelcome moral code by ascribing it to God Himself.

The compulsion of law generates habits of obedience, which may continue when compulsion ceases or is concealed; conscience is the deposit of a Mississippi of prohibitions. Meanwhile the heavy hand of custom clamps an order upon the soul; rebellion flares as ability seeks room and place, and subsides as place is found; the man of thirty accepts custom as the congealed wisdom of the group. Only twenty years knows more than twenty centuries.

Freedom is the goal and exoneration of order; without it order would have no meaning and no excuse. How does freedom come and grow?

It comes first from the soul itself, which is personality, and demands to be heard. Civilization, like every artifice, is an art that Nature makes; the human spirit creates it, and bears its hindrances, because the justification of law is the pruning of liberty to let liberty grow. Freedom in chaos is impossible; dictatorship dies when order is secure. Only the fear of disorder reconciles men to tyranny, for the natural hunger of man is for freedom.

Liberty profits from property, which gives an economic footing to personality. The consciousness that the land under our feet is our own, or that the skill of our hands is precious to our fellow men, enriches the blood and stiffens the backbone of personality, for it provides some bargaining power against external wills. Literacy promotes liberty, except where governmental propaganda makes the ability to read an impediment to the acquisition of truth. Education would make for freedom if it taught thinking; travel helps, if the traveler leaves his prejudices at home.

Civilization begins with order, grows with liberty, declines with license and dies with chaos. The great ages of culture have been periods of liberty or license: Periclean Greece, late Republican and early Imperial Rome, Renaissance Italy and France, Elizabethan England. The best condition for a cultural flowering is a conjunction of wealth and freedom, varied trade and the unhindered movement of men and ideas.

Cultural activity is not the sole goal of order and freedom—these are justified as well by simple goodness or happiness; but we should hardly call a people civilized if it produced no fruits of art or the mind. Writing is a prerequisite of civilization; and some form of education is indispensable. Civilization is an accumulation and treasure house of customs, institutions, techniques, records, memories, morals, manners, ideas, letters and arts; from this rich store the individual draws mental nourishment as the child draws milk from its mother's bottle.

Education is the conveyance and absorption, in part or substance, of this social heritage. No lifetime, however sleeplessly assiduous, could absorb it all; no mind, however learned or profound, could fully understand it, or be fit to judge its wisdom. If education should cease for a century, civilization would disappear; our grandchildren would be letterless, skill-less, lawless savages.

Art is a fragment of the cultural fragment of this racial lore; and yet art alone has a hundred varieties and a thousand styles. Men and women sing and dance, and play instruments, in the exuberance of their blood; they adorn their bodies with ointments and pigments and colorful robes; they labor to give beautiful form to buildings, images and sounds. This strange esthetic fever in man is a restless creator of civilized forms.

Science is older than civilization. It begins with the arithmetic of trade, grows with the geometry of measuring land, mounts with the astronomy of calculating seasons and crops by sun and moon, and guiding navigation by the stars. Astrology helped astronomy, as alchemy helped chemistry; and what were these men and women of so many races, who forged peace with the atomic bomb, except alchemists transmuting elements, and harnessing the energy of transmutation?

In like manner magic helped the noblest science of all—medicine. From medicine came hospitals, public sanitation, anesthesia, and that lowered death rate which, by permitting a lower birth rate, frees the individual from repetitious absorption in parentage. Through medicine came botany, physiology, anatomy, embryology and a hundred other sciences. Biology is the last great science that a civilization develops, for only in maturity do we dare to see life without mythology.

Philosophy need not develop formally in every civilization; but presumably in every civilization, and probably in barbarism and savagery, there have been philosophers—men who, like Dostoievski's Mitya, wanted "not millions, but an answer to their questions"; men who saw life in large perspective, and found everything forgivable when understood. Out of fear of the strange and unknown came curiosity and the zeal to understand; the grasp of this curiosity grew until it touched the stars; and philosophy presented the noble and at the same time ridiculous spectacle of a part trying to comprehend the whole. We shall always fail, and always try.

The Test of Civilization

If these are the constituents of civilization, we may roughly and diffidently measure a society's rank by the degree in which it displays and develops these elements.

Is it biologically orderly? Does the family function adequately as the life channel of the group? Is the birth rate neither so high as to enslave woman and spread poverty, nor so low or dysgenic as to endanger the man power or mind power of the state? Do parents care properly for their children, and children for their aging parents? Is the death rate low? Are there sufficient services of public health, sanitation and medical care? How clean are the cities, streets, homes, persons, food? . . . Taking the major living civilizations and judging them in the total and average of their past one hundred years, Germany seems to meet most successfully this biological test; Scandinavia next; then Britain, the United States and Japan. Laborious statistical investigation would be required to make this arbitrary judgment something more than a challenging suggestion.

Is the society politically orderly? Is it a government of laws, or of men? Are the laws consistent and humane? Do they widen liberty in limiting it? Do they protect life and earnings? Do they protect weakness from unjust strength, and racial and religious minorities from discrimination or intolerance? Does taxation discourage creative ambition, or confiscate legitimate property? Does monopoly control the state, or the state control monopoly? Are legislators, administrators and courts reasonably honest and competent? Does the government maintain national security without aggression upon other states? Does it explore to the utmost every alternative to war? . . . Here one would place Scandinavia first, Britain second, the United States third, France fourth, Germany last.

Is the society economically well ordered? Does it provide goods abundantly, transport them safely, distribute them widely, store them prudently, trade them to mutual advantage? Does it protect and stimulate invention, investment, co-operation, enterprise and thrift? Does it maintain a high standard of living among its people? . . . Surely the United States deserves first place under this head; and then, less assuredly, Germany, Scandinavia, Britain, France.

Is the society morally orderly? Do the family, the church and the school socialize the individual without suppressing initiative and personality? Does parental authority reasonably mingle discipline and love? What is the status of woman—of premarital relations—prostitution—marriage—divorce? How honest are commerce, religion and the press? Is wealth honored above intelligence, genius or saintliness? Are manners rude or refined? What grace and charm, solicitude and tenderness mark the conduct of women; what courage, courtesy and chivalry that of the men? How much is there of crime, corruption, cruelty; how much brutality in war? . . . Here judgment is especially difficult; one diffidently allows the first place to China, the next to Japan, then Scandinavia, Britain and the United States.

This ranking of China does not ignore her faults of prostitution, concubinage, corruption or cruelty; and the modest ranking of our own country implies no condemnation of the atomic bombs. These were "barbarous" weapons, but merciful; in this case they saved ten times more lives than they snuffed out, though their ultimate effect may be the suicide of civilization.

Is the society free? Does slavery exist, and in what scope and degree? Are persons and goods free to move about? Is the organization of capital, of management, of labor permitted? How wide is the franchise? Do habeas corpus and a jury system protect the accused individual? Is the civilian population subjected to domination by the military? Is there freedom of worship, assemblage, speech and press? Are all persons, of whatever origin, equally free to advance in education, business, industry, society and government? . . . Britain, as distinct from her empire, may rank first here; then the United States, Scandinavia, France and Germany.

Is the society culturally active? Has it a developed and flexible language, congenial to music and capable of philosophy? How widespread are literacy and the reading of good books? Does education transmit the heritage of civilization abundantly and to many; does it prepare people to think realistically, and to act with thoughtfulness and honor? What is the international standing of the nation's writers, composers, artists, scientists, philosophers? What is the quality of popular dress, amusements, arts? . . . Here France unquestionably takes the lead, followed by Germany, Britain, Russia and the United States.

If now, in reckless play, we allow each civilization five points for each first position, four for each second, three for each third, two for each fourth and one for each last, we find Britain (England, Wales and Scotland) emerging with nineteen points, Scandinavia (Denmark, Sweden and Norway) with eighteen, the United States with sixteen, Germany with fifteen, France with ten, China and Japan each with five, and Russia with two. China would have a higher rank if it were not so old; Soviet Russia if it were not so young. If we took the past four centuries into our judgment, France would be first, Germany second, Britain third. If we took the whole course of human history, China would head the roll.

How Civilizations Die

Civilization is a doll's house built on a living volcano. Any number of conditions can injure it, some can destroy it. Earthquakes can set a culture back by a decade or a century, as in ancient Rhodes. The last ice age apparently wiped out the paleolithic culture in Europe north of the Alps; the next ice age could do as much if civilization can hold out that long. A serious change of temperature might turn our civilized temperate zones into torrid jungles of barbarism, or deserts of death. Excessive rain may choke human settlements with uncontrollable vegetation; diminished rainfall may parch the soil to a point where civilization must migrate or die. So, we are told, when Western Asia prayed unheard for rain, the starving Huns poured into fertile Russia, the Goths fled westward before them, crossed the Danube into the Roman Empire and, a generation later, besieged and devastated Rome. Civilization exists by geological consent, subject to change without notice.

Since all history is a fraction of biology, a civilization can survive only by meeting those conditions of competition and selection which govern every species, society, organism, institution and idea. The health of nations is more important than the wealth of nations. We do not know yet how deeply the malarial swamps of the neglected Campagna entered into the decadence of the Roman stock.

A civilization may will its own decay by allowing its birth rate to fall to a point where its population no longer suffices to meet the tests of war. A long peace, as in Imperial Rome, or habits of luxury, as under the Abbasside caliphs at Baghdad, can blight the martial or masculine qualities of character, and make a people break under the ultimate arbitrament of arms.

The soil itself may die. Its minerals or fuels may run short; it may be parched and eroded by reckless deforestation, or exhausted by improvident tillage. Enterprise may be throttled, or capital consumed, through confiscatory taxation and wasteful government. An excessive concentration of wealth may dangerously lower the purchasing power of the masses, and so paralyze production; poverty may weaken the physiological resources of a people; and revolution may fatally disrupt the continuity of economic life. A basic change in trade routes, or in the flow of precious metals, may leave a nation off the line of wealth and growth; so the Renaissance faded in Italy, and flowered in Spain, after Columbus discovered America and its gold; and Spain withered almost overnight after losing control of Atlantic trade.

Political failure may injure or destroy a nation or a civilization. The Near East flourished under the Greeks, the Romans, and the early Caliphate, because government maintained order, kept the irrigation canals open, patronized literature and financed great art; it almost relapsed into desert when Mongol and Turkish invaders replaced order with chaos, and let the canals clog up with drifting sand. Despotism retarded Czarist Russia; prolonged revolution and war have exhausted China; total defeat has crushed Germany for a century.

Moral disorder may endanger a society. Greed, pugnacity, cruelty, sexual passion lie like toxic fungi under the surface of civilization; let law and custom and deterring creed lose control for a decade, and civilization melts back into the chaos from which it came. The growth of wealth may cause a decline in religious belief, and the two may cooperate to loosen morality; epicureanism may then go to the point of debilitating excesses, as in Nero's Rome. The family may fail to maintain permanence in marriage, or discipline in adolescence, as in the United States between two world wars; we must note, however, that most civilizations have been polygamous, and most cultural zeniths have been notorious for immorality. The continued progress of means, and barbarism of ends, has brought European civilization close to disaster in our time; only the survival of a technologically uninjured America has saved the Old World from collapse.

Mental decay may dry up the spiritual sources of a civilization. Originality and initiative may be reduced by a stereotyped education. Superstition is everywhere, and keeps its ground under every change of creed; ignorance is an endless sea on which the frail bark of civilization rides storm after storm. Sciences rise and fall, philosophies are born and die; but superstition and ignorance abide with us forever, waiting in the amplitude of time to swallow man's proud and brief enlightenment.

Statesmanship and Civilization

The highest statesmanship would be one that guarded by positive action against all these sources of decline. It would be not only political and economic, but also geological, biological, moral and educational, statesmanship. It could not hold back an ice floe or dissuade an earthquake; but it would, like the Pharaohs and Caliphs at their height, encourage and organize the basic irrigation and conservation of the soil; it would check erosion and deforestation, and would consider the mineral and fuel resources of the subsoil as public assets requiring public control.

It might combine military training with the work of irrigation and conservation, and could reasonably exact a year of such service from every youth. It would provide efficient public sanitation, free medical service and midday meals for all school children, and competent medical care—preventive and curative—for such classes of the population as cannot afford a private practitioner. It would encourage the birth rate by offering maternity endowments conditional on medical certificates of fitness for parentage; by allowing greater tax exemption per child; and by financing low-cost homes of a kind that would invite domestic life. Better homes are better than better roads. We spend too much in facilitating movement, too little in dignifying rest.

How can I sing of my joy?
How can I spend wind drift and laughter,
Sun flakes and fragrance and tears
Idly falling; and after Sleep, and the safety of night
Met without pain:
How can I sing of my joy to live again?

I have been dead. I have known
The burden of earth on my breast.
I have been dead without wings, without rest.
Now I am whole, shall I sing in a reedy voice
What the stars and the tides cannot say

Economic statesmanship would encourage agriculture with low-interest loans to reduce mortgages and tenancy; with cheap electric power and irrigation through more undertakings like the Norris and Grand Coulee dams. It would ensure access to materials and capital to all legitimate enterprise. It would protect the right of management and labor to organize, and would develop trustworthy agencies of arbitration. It would check the fluctuations of the business cycle by high taxation in prosperity, and by low taxation and extended public works and services in depression. It would supervise foreign trade to balance exports with imports; it would aim to receive not gold but goods. It would not nationalize industry, but would exercise full rights of supervision in the public's name, and would encourage co-operatives to check the abuses of monopoly. It would extend social-security insurance to all desiring it. It would operate national laboratories to advance pure science, and to prepare for national defense.

Since the chief problem of government is to maintain its own efficiency and integrity, political statesmanship would begin at the source, and encourage universities to establish schools of government comparable with the best schools of medicine or law. It would set up a central Civil Academy to serve as a model and clearinghouse for such schools, and to train personnel for diplomacy and administration. It would invite each science, profession, industry and trade to elect representatives to a National Advisory Council, which would study the long-term problems of national life, and periodically submit its findings and recommendations to state and national legislatures. It would leave to local government all powers whose centralization is not compelled by the growth of interstate commerce or the imperatives of international relations. It would distrust any law that did not make for greater liberty. It would discourage racial discrimination and animosity, without suppressing freedom of speech or press.

It is generally admitted that it is better to have loved your wife than never to have loved at all.

—EDGAR SALTUS: The Pomps of Satan (Brentano's.)

A statesman cannot afford to be a moralist, as Augustus, greatest of all statesmen, found out. Moral statesmanship must be cautiously indirect. Men pride themselves on their vices, and some conceal their virtues until they are dead. Morality is unnatural, goes heavily against the grain; we put up with it because our neighbors need it. Nevertheless, despite what might be called the killing pace of our times, we need not be ashamed of our morality. We cannot be certain that earlier epochs were inferior to our own in sexual irregularity, dishonesty and crime; perhaps their records were negligently kept.

Half the sexual digressions of our age are due to the deferment of marriage by the urban-industrial lengthening of economic adolescence. The restoration of the dowry system would lower the age of marriage, and make for a healthier morality. It is a task for religion, education and public opinion rather than for law; but the state might help by those measures—already listed—which would make home life more attractive, and parentage less costly. Gifts by parents to their married children under twenty-eight years of age should come under the same rule of limited tax deductibility as gifts to education and charity.

Despite our healthy suspicion of centralized power, Federal support of education seems unavoidable in states whose soil or situation leaves them off the highway of national prosperity; there should be no great difficulty in arranging for the use of such funds by state boards under Federal supervision. Since ability may appear in any rank, and all talent should be developed, municipal and state scholarships should be offered in sufficient number to advance the competent children of the poor to higher education; and Federal scholarships might invite exceptional graduates to a National Institute for Advanced Studies working in harmony with a National Advisory Council. Education in racial appreciation and friendliness should be a part of every curriculum in every year.

Education might profitably make more use of motion pictures and radio broadcasts; and these should be encouraged to make more use of education. Perhaps as the Government undertakes low-cost housing where private capital finds no adequate reward, so the Government might, without interfering with private enterprise, maintain a broadcasting station and a film studio devoted to good music and living education. Meanwhile, educators must continue to improve their methods of enlivening their programs with drama, dialogue and debate; for outside of school no man can be educated against his will. The finger that turns the dial rules the air.

The Prospects of Civilization

This is not a Utopian program; indeed, in all these fields western civilization has made substantial progress in our times. Good men and good women abound, all news to the contrary notwithstanding; and in this decade we have seen such heroism and statesmanship as may reconcile us to our bloody age. The white man's leadership was challenged; his decadence was asserted, he suspected it himself; suddenly, by leadership and strategy as excellent as any in history, he is again on the top of the world. Democracy was challenged; liberty was laughed at; great deeds, we were told, required mass obedience to supermen; but again the individualistic, law-resenting, government-denouncing, rollicking, profane Yankee has emerged with flying colors from the most gigantic struggle in history. Our industries have won the war by indefatigable invention, skillful labor and intelligent management; our youth, which not long since ate goldfish and phonograph records, has proved its discipline, courage, ability and stamina, and has all the while retained its genial humanity. This demonstration of American vitality, this resolute resurrection of Britain, must renew and strengthen democracy. Here and in Britain and in Russia—which fought the most unstinted fight of all—victory will surely stimulate literature and art, inspiring men and women with something of the spirit of Greece after Marathon, or Rome after Actium.

Will the association of science and war destroy our civilization? Possibly; all civilizations are mortal, and exhaustion by war is one of many ways in which they can die. But the wide dissemination of industrial technology, and the improved means of transmitting it from one generation to the next, render such a demise highly improbable in this century. The same ingenuity that designed new forms of attack will design new patterns of defense; and the same brilliance of mind and tenacity of will that found new means to destroy will, if asked, find statesmanship to preserve. We need not less science, but more; not less in war and industry, but more in government and the organization of peace. Let the Economic Council of the United Nations watch continuously, and seek to control at their source the conditions which make for war—the land hunger of countries suffering from overpopulation, the chemical hunger of industrial systems excluded from necessary fuels or materials, the commercial hunger of nations that "must export or die," the geographical hunger of nations seeking outlets on open seas.

What Rome accomplished for two centuries with the Pax Romana may be achieved in our time by an association of nations backed by the power of American industry. American civilization overflows with vigor and youth; for a long time it will hold the economic leadership of the world. We have only discovered our power. Can we find in ourselves the statesmanship to use it for the greater happiness of mankind? It is a high call to a magnificent destiny.

Just One Cake of Camay—
Softer, Smoother Skin is yours!

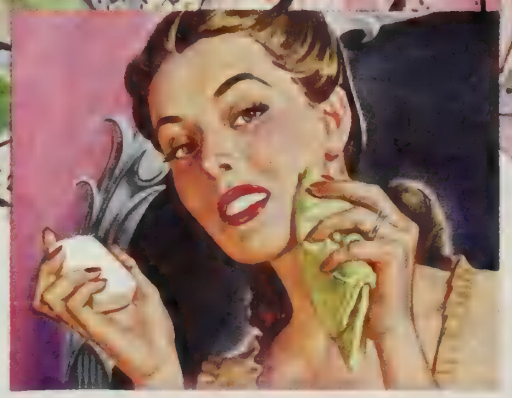
MRS. WILLIAM KIRK STEWART
the former Virginia Welch of Los Angeles, Cal.
Bridal portrait painted by Bolgard



There's a promise of romance—in the softer glow, the fresher beauty that comes to your skin—with your first cake of Camay! Simply change from careless cleansing to the Camay Mild-Soap Diet. Doctors tested Camay's daring beauty promise—on scores and scores of complexions—under exact clinical conditions. And the doctors reported that woman after woman—using just one cake of Camay—had fresher, softer-looking skin.

MRS. STEWART'S STORY—

"I tumbled—Bill fell, too," skiing at St. Adele, in the romantic Laurentian Mountains. Both devotees of outdoor sports, Ginny keeps the warm sun-glow in her skin radiantly fresh. "It's Camay for me—and has been, since my first cake brought out a real sparkle in my complexion."

"If you want lovelier skin," advises Ginny, "go on the Camay Mild-Soap Diet, as I did." Yes—it's simple, take a minute night and morning to pat Camay over face, forehead, nose. See—mild Camay cleanses without irritation! Follow with a warm rinse—add a cold splash for oily skin. Doctors proved this mild care softens, smooths skin—with just one cake of Camay!

Precious Moments for collecting memories: While overseas, Bill treasured each remembrance of Ginny's fresh young loveliness—caressable complexion. "I wanted to be looking my best—when he returned," Ginny confides, "so I never neglected my Camay Mild-Soap Diet—not even for a day!"

Meet three Career Girls

"ST. JOSEPH, MISSOURI, WAS NEVER LIKE THIS!"
CAFFIE, GRETCHEN AND JANIE FIND THAT NEW YORK
IS JUST A GROWN-UP TOWN WITH A HEART OF GOLD

BY BETTY HANNAH HOFFMAN

JANIE McPHERSON, Catherine Barrow and Gretchen Chase grew up within two blocks of one another in St. Joseph, Missouri (pronounced Meh-zu'-ra), joined the same high-school sorority, sang through the same steak fries and hilarious hay rides together. All of them went away to college, and all of them came down with the career bug together—the high-fever, rapid-pulse New York variety. It was not hard to picture themselves in a Hollywood version of a career girl's apartment: frilly organdy at the windows, gleaming porcelain in the kitchen; flowers, telegrams and men arriving in a dizzy whirl; stimulating jobs in the most exciting city in the world.

The shock was all the more devastating, therefore, the day Caffie arrived last spring at the West 88th Street address where the two others had glowingly written they had finally found an apartment.

"You sure this is the right address, lady?" the cab driver asked her suspiciously, taking in her well-tailored gray tweed traveling costume, her expensive-looking luggage.

Caffie, a tall, full-blown beauty in a soft dark Southern way, glanced from the grimy old brownstone to the letter in her hand and nodded dubiously.

"You gonna live here? I warn ya, lady, ya gotta be careful in New York!"

"When I saw that apartment," admits Caffie in her hesitant drawl, "I just about collapsed."

"The kitchen was kind of built into the bathroom," Janie explains brightly. Meaning an old-fashioned bathroom with curtains and wallboard, the kitchen half consisting of a tiny stove with an icebox underneath and an enormous slimy-looking green marble sink. "That's where we washed our teeth, our carrots and our stockings," giggles Janie with the shining brown hair worn in a smooth page-boy, the brown eyes that slant childishly at the corners of her elfin face.

There wasn't any table large enough for dining, so they ate standing up in the kitchen-bathroom, sharing (at first) one knife and one fork. Their living-bedroom, papered in tones of Mississippi-mud and enlivened with a picture of Henry the Eighth voraciously tearing into a turkey wing, had a double bed (very hard) and a cot (even harder). The bed was supposed to double as a couch by day, but if you leaned back against Henry VIII, your feet stuck most uncomfortably straight out in front of you.

"All you could do was kind of lie on it," explains Gretchen with the beautifully husky voice.

More pressing than the cockroach problem, the smells of musty halls and stale cabbage, the clarion-voiced neighbors and their radios, was the rent: $83 a month.

Caffie was the only one who arrived with a job. An apologetic Phi Bete, who never bought a gold key because she didn't know where she could safely hide it, Caffie was approached by a Guaranty Trust talent scout on the Duke campus and offered a job in their big downtown Broadway office. As a tax-analyst trainee, she was offered $161 a month and she took it, mainly to get to New York. Unhappily, she has since decided that the joys of independence are in direct proportion to the independent woman's income—at least in New York—and that where you live, where you play, how many "interesting people" you meet depend primarily on whom you know.

"Gee," sighs Caffie, "you pass such attractive men on the street all day, cute lieutenants and all. But how do you meet them?"

When she and Gretchen offered their services as hostesses at the Hotel Commodore's Officers' Club, they were informed rather testily there was a waiting list of 3000!

Janie, on the other hand, has met lots of men—the young, unattached, rare variety—in the advertising office where she works. She has dates galore, for lunch, for dinner at the Stork and dancing at the Roosevelt. Ebullient Janie is enraptured with New York.

This twenty-two-year-old ball of fire came to crash big-time advertising faced with hurdles which make her knees shake now. She had very little money; her railroad fare from home and first week's hotel bill practically finished the $200 she had saved as ad writer for the St. Joseph News-Press and Gazette ($17 a week). And there was nothing forthcoming from a determined parent back home but a return railroad ticket when she admitted defeat. Janie went around to all the agencies and confidently trotted out her college record: song leader at National Park College, Washington, D. C., and business manager of the yearbook at the University of Missouri School of Journalism, where she finished her schooling. She exhibited a pocketbookful of ads she had written for the home-town news sheets, a vast amount of dogged Scotch persistence and, last but not least, her own most attractive looks. There's just something about that wide, white gamine smile, those Paulette Goddard eyes.

"She's the kind of girl," one businessman summed her up nostalgically, "that in a roomful of girls at a college prom, every boy wants to dance with."

Janie's break came when an advertising friend of a friend in St. Joe gave her some complimentary ten-dollar-a-plate dinner tickets to deliver to the personnel director at Young and Rubicam, one of New York's biggest advertising firms. Told to leave them at the front desk, as the personnel director was busy, Janie shrewdly refused to give them up without an interview. During the interview she learned that no copy writers were needed, but that there was a secretarial position open with a vice-president, Charles Whittier.

"I wasn't at all interested in being a secretary, and acted very snooty, but consented to see the vice-president," says Janie.

She left with the notion the job was hers if she gave the nod, and learning afterward that Mr. Whittier was one of the top ad men in the country, she decided to snap it up. So she sat down and wrote complacent little notes to all the agencies where she had been interviewed, saying she was no longer interested in jobs with them, since she was starting with Young and Rubicam.

The next day, bouncing into Mr. Whittier's outer office, she was considerably startled to find the room crammed with young women applying for the job—what's more, being interviewed for

"First time we moved—from the Sheraton to the Y.W.C.A. around the corner—the doorman and bellboy helped." This time, the sixth move in six months, the muscle men are young executives from Janie's old job at Young and Rubicam.

)PY WRITER Janie's mother was New York career girl in last war. In y agency, Janie makes $280 month, wants advertising full-time career. "She's smart," says Artist Janson.

PERSONNEL Gretchen interviews 40 people a day for American Express, makes $177 month plus bonus—"but a career for life? NO. I want to do a cracking good job of raising a family!"

FINANCE Caffie, a math minor at Duke University, was discovered by a talent scout from Guaranty Trust, makes $161 month as tax trainee. She says, "New Yorkers are in a rut!"

"What's the budget?" the girls ask their men. Usually it's for peanuts, but this time it's Café Society Downtown.

Supper dates are touchy affairs when a rising young career girl makes more money than her man does. Janie avoids a crisis by asking the man to bring home the bacon. She cooks it herself—but beautifully!

"New York means a little black dress and an interesting man—socially." On the Swarthmore campus, Gretch Chase was famous for her men and for her brains, in New York has not found it easy to meet interesting men.

"Caffie's got the Southern approach to men," Janie says. The handsome profile belongs to Lt. Bob Hillyard, "a boy from home." She's a Phi Bete, but tries to keep it secret.

it. Janie was suddenly and painfully aware of the loose change in her pocket, all that remained of the original $200, her complete lack of shorthand, her peck-and-hunt typing. When her turn came to see Mr. Whittier, all hauteur toward secretarial jobs had vanished and she was a desperately scared young woman. Fortunately, that gentleman remarked, with astonishing softheartedness, "Anyone who would do such a dumb thing deserves to be hired by me." And cheerfully bought a Dictaphone.

On lunch hours, Janie continued to make the rounds of the other advertising agencies. Then, last September—fairy-tale endings do sometimes happen in New York—she was hired by William Esty and Company as a full-fledged copy writer at $65 a week.

"Dad sure hit the roof when I decided to go to New York; said an inexperienced kid like me didn't have a prayer in national advertising. Now he's strutting all over St. Joe," laughs Janie, "taking all the credit."

Gretchen Chase spent six strenuous months persuading her family to let her go to New York, where she established some sort of record in landing her present job in one week. She used a personal acquaintance at American Express to inform that company that they were terribly antiquated in not having a personnel department, and how about hiring her? It so happened that American Express, which is now staffing some fifty-nine foreign offices and hundreds of travel bureaus throughout the U. S. in expectation of a wild travel boom, was actually drawing up such a department. She was hired as assistant to the personnel director, at $177 a month.

Gretchen, a rare combination of highly efficient get-up-and-go, an arresting, heart-shaped face and a lot of soul, learned her psychology at Swarthmore, where she whizzed through in three years. She informed the dean there that she chose this Quaker college because her parents once had a flat tire in the village and admired the (Continued on Page 142)

LIFE, OF COURSE, doesn't wait to begin. Even at four years old, your children are building the failures or successes they may have at forty.

Your care . . . your wisdom . . . the way you feed your children day by day means so much now, while they're growing. They need all the right foods, every day. They need plenty of food energy to help them grow strong and sturdy.

Nucoa for food energy and Vitamin A

With your children—all Uncle Sam's children—in mind, Nucoa is made with extreme attention to nourishing quality as well as fine flavor. The first margarine whose chief ingredients—pure vegetable oils and fresh pasteurized, cultured skim milk—came entirely from American farms, Nucoa was the first to add Vitamin A. And now Nucoa is the first margarine to give you so much Vitamin A—15,000 U.S.P. units in each pound, guaranteed winter and summer.

Two ounces of Nucoa (about three generous table servings) supply 62% of a child's, and 47% of an adult's, minimum daily requirement of Vitamin A!

Children love plenty of spread on their bread. And they should! Don't skimp them. Nucoa supplies as much food energy as the most expensive spread for bread—at such low cost! And there's no "storage" Nucoa. Freshly made the year round, Nucoa always tastes sweet and fresh—so good on bread, vegetables, or baked potato, it really and truly "melts in your mouth."

Appetizing Tricks with Nucoa

Nutritious: Nucoa comes to you pure white. It has its full, nourishing value of food energy and Vitamin A in this form. But you may easily tint it for table use, if you like, by first softening it and then creaming into it the contents of the pure Color-Wafer inserted in each package.

Chef Touch: Before chilling Nucoa tinted as above, remove a small quantity and mix in chopped parsley or chives—ready for smart seasoning of potatoes, fish, cauliflower!

JANE McPHERSON met an unusually good one. One of her biggest thrills was the chance to buy clothes with her own money. The natural impulse was to splurge—she admits to three suits the first six months. Now she has a budget, plans to spend around $400 a year, about 12 per cent of her salary. (Percentages vary with incomes and according to personal obligations and types of jobs. Jane's is not high for $3380 a year.) Her two most vital costumes are: a black suit, $55, which she changes with blouses, sweaters and scarfs for the office, with hats and jewelry for "meet me at 5:15" dates; a "terrific" black dress, $39.50, with endless accessory possibilities. ## Pick Him Up

By Louise Paine Benjamin

Beauty Editor of the Journal

NO subject is more fascinating to a girl of marriageable age than man. Why not? Since it's love that makes the world go round, it would be a dull girl who refused to do her bit toward keeping the globe (and herself) spinning! This global motor, like any other, requires occasional expert tinkering. A smart girl who wants a smoothly turning love life informs herself, by observation and inquiry, as to successful procedure. The meeting and management of men is a subject of unlimited possibilities. We have garnered opinions from a wide assortment of girls known for the success of their dating, beginning with the three lively lovelies shown on these pages and extending to dozens of others. In particular, we have questioned girls who are on their own, away from the home-town environment of old friends and familiar young-crowd activities, and who have had to fend for themselves.

How does a girl go about the business of meeting a nice young man when she isn't in a situation where introductions to the opposite sex can be easily and conventionally arranged? Is a pickup ever justified?

Somewhere between the pert sixteen-year-old who responds to street-corner whistles and the stuffy matron who chills her dining-car vis-à-vis when he asks for the salt, we need a middle ground where men and women and boys and girls can meet and get acquainted without formal introductions, and without stigma. Until this very real problem finds a better solution, healthy well-balanced girls of today are making their own rules. Some of this current procedure would have scandalized grandma and Aunt Prue. There is still, however, a foundation of hard common sense underneath the innovations. In the next columns is a summary of the present-day thinking on the foundation step in romance: meeting a nice man.

AFTER MEETING—WHAT THEN?

Making conversation isn't a problem with most American girls. News, sports and current entertainment events can always be used to try out the ground until more personal interests are discovered. In the home, the plush photograph album of yesteryear has given way to albums of the latest James and Cugat recordings, as a means of diversion. American girls, who began in kindergarten discussing interior decorating for dollhouses, and equal rights for women in the sand box, find exchange of thought easy and stimulating.

Parlor Tricks don't do so much for the modern young woman as kitchen talent, according to her own statement. The girl who can rustle up a hot tempting supper need fear no competition from her sister with the pretty voice, although there is still great enthusiasm for crowd singing around the piano. Away from the rush of the office and far from her own family, a girl (Continued on Page 122)

HERE ARE THE ANSWERS IF YOU'RE A STRANGER IN THE CITY

Is a Pickup Always a Mistake?

The whistle-and-wink variety on a street corne*Yes.* The quick acquaintance on a mutual friend mutual interest basis at a vacation resort, on a skating rink, in business—anywhere that men and wome might meet on a casual, equal basis: not necessarily What is a pickup, anyway? "A chance acquaintance," says Webster. And if Webster could for sake the formal phrase, he might add that such "chance acquaintance" may spring from a mutu healthy attraction that wants to say more than brisk "hello." Since the most delightful experience are often accidental, who wants to be deprived friendship simply on the grounds of unconventionality! In this matter, as in most, it is still what yo do, rather than how, when and where.

Briefly, the theory of the well-balanced moder girl about casual meetings seems to be this:

★ Permissible acquaintances may start spontaneously: when you are lodged under the same roof, particularly with a somewhat restricted group, as at vacation hotel or camp, a ship or cruise boat. Trai are not entirely off bounds, but require greater discretion because of the transitory nature of mo trips, though most girls can easily distinguish between the club-car Casanova and the travel-wea gentleman who merely wishes to pass the time day. Safe rule about train conversation: unless y have discovered mutual acquaintances, better call quits and carry your own bags when you get to yo station.

★ Sports backgrounds give a wholesome implicatio to casual meetings, since a good tennis game c make as strong a bid for friendship as a good han shake. Badminton courts, ski slides, skating rin and golf courses carry an aura of health and go sportsmanship. Often there is a professional, or cl manager, who can arrange introductions. Swi ming pools are less desirable, and public beaches a amusement parks are out.

"Guess what! My boss has just given me two tickets for the ice show!" That's a legitimate excuse for calling a man friend, as nice girls like Gretchen all agree.

Call Him Up

"How would you like to top off the evening with milk and cookies?" Jane is noted for hospitality, but also for good judgment. Likes to share dates with pretty roommates.

Ask Him Up

Classrooms serve as a respectable introduction. The young man who is a fellow student in journalism, Spanish, art appreciation or current events is presumably as ambitious and discriminating as you are yourself! (And if it's a night class, he's probably attending for the same reasons you are!)

Not permissible: any street meeting. Better avoid restaurant acquaintances, too; as any girl accepting friendly overtures in an eating place invites the suspicion that she is willing to exchange a bright smile for her dinner check. Anything that could be interpreted as "gold digging" is out. A girl would have only herself to blame if a young man misunderstood her friendliness when they were standing in line to buy entertainment tickets.

Case Histories: 1. Two girls and two servicemen arrived simultaneously at a church door on V-J Day. "May we go in with you?" asked the boys. Realizing these two men shared a deep feeling about the religious significance of this day, the girls agreed and it proved to be the beginning of a pleasant friendship.

2. Stalled in a freezing-cold trolley car during a snowstorm, a blue-nosed passenger finally said to his pretty neighbor, "Cold, isn't it?" She agreed, and a conversational thaw set in that led to the discovery of mutual acquaintances and a later friendship.

3. On a long train ride a college student asked the girl with whom he shared a double seat if she would care to look at some of his magazines. She, in turn, asked him to share her package of sandwiches to avoid a crowded dining car. When the magazines and sandwiches gave out, the conversation began. Common interest in good reading, and eventually in each other, resulted in a permanent friendship.

How Do Girls Meet Their Men?

Most girls arriving in a new town, and not already equipped with evening entertainment in the form of home-town friends or old schoolmates, meet companionable males through blind dates.

A girl who doesn't want to sit alone twiddling her thumbs, listening to dance music and reading old letters from home, does well to cultivate popular members of her own sex, especially the kind of girl likely to have escorts who would want to "bring along a friend."

Young married couples (since most such couples have a dreamy-eyed penchant for wanting others to be as happy as they are!) can also be a special asset to the lonely girl, if the husband feels inclined to round up his unattached pals.

Before moving to a new town, most girls do a little long-range planning by collecting names and notes of introduction, or even phone numbers of eligible males, friends of friends or relatives back home. Sharing even one mutual friend can bridge the gap of a lonely evening, and one good evening usually leads to another.

★ How about business associates? Offices do not so often abound in personable bachelors and datable bosses' sons as fiction would indicate. The girl who hopes to find a bright young man of her dreams in the commercial world should attach herself to a business which favors ambitious youth. Airlines, radio, television, chemical and electrical companies making new products are looking forward to boom times in the world of tomorrow and are absorbing a lot of fresh young blood. But since most girls select a job first and consider the men in the field afterward, the question is still unanswered.

★ How about arranging a meeting in a big organization? Feminine ingenuity ought to be equal to this, but since modern girls are loath to go about the office dropping small lace handkerchiefs or fainting into the arms of the chief filing clerk—it isn't. If you can't possibly enlist the help of a kindly associate (that's the girl with the friend with the friend, you know), or discover a mutual friend, or make use of an employee club or group, there is at least one time-honored gambit: ask for information. An intelligent question is always flattering to an intelligent man. "Would you like to stop over this evening—I'm having a few friends in?" or "Let's play tennis Saturday afternoon—don't you think this weather's too wonderful to waste?" may be very intelligent questions.

★ After hours, you can widen your social circle by going in for sports or joining classes. Good for figure and personality too! But take up only things you really like. As a clumsy ice skater, you will hardly become the belle of the rink, but you may find a friend who admires you for trying! If you are bored by social science but think a course in it would bring you into touch with clever lads, keep in mind that their genuine enthusiasm for a subject out of your field might bore you as much as the class itself. But since any alert young man has a variety of interests to make good after-class conversation, it's worth trying.

In some communities there are active young people's groups, connected with church or "Y." These are always worth investigating, especially if they concern themselves with such lively interests as hiking, bicycling, photography or archery, which attract an enthusiastic crowd.

★ Volunteer workers are still being used by service organizations. The much publicized hostess jobs may be overcrowded, but try for something less glamorous. You'll meet other good sports, of both sexes. But do consider the work first and the friendships second. Soldiers and civilians alike shy away from the eager-beaver type of girl who tries to buy a lifetime attachment with one plate of ham sandwiches.

★ Take your vacation in a place that has a director of social activities or sports. Here's where that tennis you've been practicing on indoor courts comes into its own. How is your dancing? The daylight beauty bar, made to fit beneath the bedroom windows, helps their three-part harmony by keeping make-up out of the bathroom.

These career girls are smart enough to realize that especially when one's foot is on the first rung of the ladder, the shoe it wears must be shining, the stocking seams straight and trim. That smooth-as-cream look, more to be desired nowadays than pretty-pretty, can be achieved by any girl who gets an iron, a mending basket, a bevy of good brushes and plenty of soap 'n' water on her side!

BY JUDY BARRY

IF they were going to be cast off on a desert island, Janie and Caffie would probably shout as they leaped, "Hey, Gretch, make sure we have the iron!" Pressing the dress or suit of the day is as automatic with each of them as brushing their teeth in the morning, for, with the possible exception of her lipstick, they consider her iron a girl's best accessory to looking smartly groomed.

Partly because they're naturally fastidious, of course, partly because they realize that the way they look is important in their ladder climbing, Janie, Caffie and Gretchen are stern with themselves about getting up in the morning and allowing time to do a good all-day job of grooming. Not that they like obeying the alarm any better than the next one, but it didn't take them long to discover that leaving the house in the morning looking "all of a piece" is the best way to save time, face and temper all day.

Fortunately, they go off to work at different times, which allows for a "stagger system" of bath, breakfast and turn at the ironing board. One of the most blissful things about their new apartment, to them, is having a closet apiece, to say nothing of a bathroom approachable from the hall! Their last one opened from the bedroom—alas for the girl who slipped off to bed early in hopes of catching a bit of extra beauty sleep!

Now the morning traffic jam in the bathroom—one of the things which make living alone seem to take on great charm, about eight A.M., to those who don't—has been unsnarled a great deal by their brand-new beauty bar, for it keeps making-up activities out of the bathroom. Dreamed up by a carpenter with imagination, the bar fits beneath their bedroom windows, has daylight to help them do an artistic job of make-up, three private and personal drawers, and three little stools that slide beneath it. In addition to speeding up the morning getaway, as Janie says, "Isn't it adorable?"

"We have such good resolutions," they sigh earnestly in chorus. "Now that we have it, and such wonderful closets 'n' everything, we intend to be as perfect as the Duchess of Windsor!"

Career Girls Can Cook

BY LOUELLA G. SHOUER

CAREER gals who have apartments have kitchens. Not only that, they use them with know-how. A trio like Gretchen, Caffie and Janie are in luck. Six hands are better than two—collaboration pays off. They like to eat—they like to cook. If one has a date with a marine, the other two make a date with the stove. They switch about on the chefing!

For them a meal must be more than a sandwich, but it must be easy and must of necessity be on the budgety side. Out on a date, their choice might be frogs' legs Provençale, but at home they lean to tricks with hamburger, a pot roast that stretches and generously seasoned stews.

Like thousands of their sisters, they are getting on to the frozen-food delicacies that make meal getting easier and easier. They are learning, too, about mixes and the "just add water" kind of cooking. For nights when there's nary a minute for skillet skill before a theater date, they patronize the "kitchens"—establishments which in answer to a phone call deliver a complete hot dinner, à la basket. There are many ways to make quick work of getting a meal—but cooking for fun can't always be streamlined. Don't have all your meals "rapid transit."

HOW AMERICA LIVES

Dinner in 1-2-3! Gretch is dessert gal.

Janie pops tonight's salad dessert into refrigerator before taking off for the office.

A meat trick to brag about. A quick trick with meat is a feather in anyone's cap. And the angle must be flaunty if the girls are really going to take it over for their own. This one rates their "brag list." It's quick, not costly, has a chefy touch, and as Janie says, "it has a zingy flavor."

BROILED MEAT LOAF

Mix 1 pound hamburger with ¼ cup prepared mustard, 1 teaspoon salt, dash of pepper, 2 tablespoons bread crumbs, ¼ cup milk, ¼ cup chopped onions, 1 egg, beaten. Mix very thoroughly; shape into one large patty in piepan. Lay bacon strips over the top. Broil fifteen minutes. Serves 4. If you have more time the night before than you expect to have the night you serve this, mix, shape and have it all ready in the piepan. Cover and put in the refrigerator. We know it works. We tried it—the night-before business, I mean.

Dinner while you wait. Quick meat dishes are fine when you are right on hand to tend to them—but on Saturdays and Sundays a meal in the oven is worth two under the broiler. If you're "at home," it's cozy to curl up with a book and listen to your favorite records while dinner cooks. Then, too, if your date's coming to dinner, you want the kind of meal that will cook without watching. Impress him, you know.

BAKED DILL PORK CHOPS

Season 4 pork chops with salt and pepper. Roll in flour. Brown in just enough shortening to keep them from burning. Transfer to a small roaster or casserole. Add 2 onions, chopped, and 2 dill pickles, chopped. Add 1½ cups water and 2 tablespoons pickle juice to the pan in which you browned the chops. Heat up to loosen the pan drippings. Pour over the chops. Put on the lid and bake one hour in moderate oven, 350° F. Serves 4.

MEMO TO GRETCHEN: Put some potatoes in to bake along with the chops. Frozen applesauce—almost but not quite thawed—is wonderful with this. Your date can help toss up the salad.

Advance notice. Last to turn the key in the lock in the morning, Janie sometimes gives dinner a starter before she leaves for her job. At night, then, the while, or whatever their supreme concentration for the evening may be, can demand full attention. If you're not in Janie's shoes and your morning hour is one mad rush, this model can be made the evening before.

GREEN-GRAPE DESSERT SALAD

To 1 package lemon or lime flavored gelatin add 1 cup hot water. Stir until dissolved. Add 1 cup cold water. Pour into freezing tray and let stand in freezing compartment five to eight minutes. It won't freeze in this time. The idea is to give it a quick chill to the "thick and sirupy stage." Cut 1 package cream cheese into 6 squares. Put a cube in the bottom of each of 6 individual molds. Wash and stem 1 pound seedless grapes. Mix grapes with the thickening gelatin. Pour over the cheese. Chill until set. Takes fifteen minutes to prepare. Serves 6. If you haven't enough molds, make the salad in a square pan, spacing the cheese squares. Cut as needed.

An evening at home. There comes a night or two in every week when all three of an apartment trio are home at once. These may be nights off for writing letters, washing hose, putting up your hair or just generally catching up on household and mending chores. The St. Joe girls use some of these evenings to cook up something for the next night's meal—particularly if they expect company one night hence. Gretchen is most apt to officiate if their evening's accomplishment is to be a dessert—and this is one of those "overnight stands" that she particularly likes to coddle. She has many desserts up her sleeve that use "chocolate bits"—and here's one that is goopy and good. The boys will like it, too, or I miss my guess.

LAZY CAKE

Melt 1 package (7 oz.) chocolate bits over hot water. Beat 3 egg yolks until quite thick. Add ⅓ cup sugar gradually, beating well after each addition. Add a pinch of salt, 1 teaspoon vanilla and 3 tablespoons coffee. (Save some from breakfast for this.) Combine with the melted bits and cook fifteen minutes in double boiler over hot water. Keep flame low—keep stirring. While this does take fifteen minutes of your

WHEN SHE CAN AND WHEN SHE CAN'T

appreciates a young-man friend who can casually share an evening "at home."

Double dating is extremely popular, especially during the getting-acquainted stages, since it makes for general gaiety on an impersonal basis.

Chair warmers who accept hospitality without ever offering to repay it are as unpopular in this generation as the last. Girls are, however, tenderhearted about pocketbooks, and are perfectly contented with an evening of movies and sodas. They like escorts to have definite plans so they themselves are spared the embarrassment of suggesting something not within the budget (or simply having to suggest "let's sit this one out" too). Most girls who work a forty-hour week consider their evenings valuable and personal property, and are perfectly willing to ask frankly what the bank roll affords and plan an evening accordingly.

TELEPHONE TECHNIQUE

The universal telephone has multiplied the problems and possibilities of romance. Who should call whom—and when?

The girl who boasts that she calls her men friends just as freely as they call her probably has to do her own asking to have a date at all. For a checkup shows that gentlemen still like to take the initiative, especially in the matter of suggesting dates.

All are agreed, however, that there are a number of perfectly legitimate occasions (and a few at which even the most stuff-shirted young man would wink and accept) when a conservative young woman can take the first step:

1. To make a change in plans or communicate any other important news relative to their mutual interests.

2. To invite the gentleman to a group affair, which might be a home party or an outside evening organized by girls, such as a sorority or school dance. Girls living alone or with other girls must act as their own hostesses and feel as free about extending invitations for dinner or an afternoon visit as their mothers might be.

3. To share some entertainment treat which has unexpectedly come her way—perhaps two tickets for a concert, or Oklahoma! Any such treats are more "arranged" than "unexpected"; a girl may feel that she is simply doing her share in promoting a friendship.

WILL YOU COME INTO MY PARLOR?

Any girl with homemaking instincts, away from her parental roof, moves out of a furnished room and into her own apartment just as soon as her pay envelope makes it possible. One of the chief reasons she wants a home is so she can entertain her friends, including men. When a group of girls who are old friends live together and share their dates, no particular problem arises. But what about the girl living alone, or the girl who takes turns with her roommate in the use of their common living room? May she invite a male companion to an occasional home-cooked dinner? Should she ask him in for refreshments after an evening of dancing or movies?

The answer is that she does; the girls all agree on this. But, without exception, they make this stipulation: Never invite to your apartment alone anyone whom you do not know well enough to be perfectly sure about his behavior. No matter how charming a casual acquaintance, withhold invitations to your unchaperoned home until you are quite sure that you will not find yourself in an awkward situation. And most girls agree that "situations" which do arise are almost always the girl's fault, since any girl knows the difference between low lights and soft music in the living room and casual friendship of cheese and crackers in the kitchen!

Which proves that right-minded girls understand very well the difference between liberty . . . and liberties!

boat of a kid. The pink-and-white kind with gilt bangs and a tilted nose and enormous lake-blue eyes and a three-cornered smile smack out of a storybook. And a rare and delicious sense of humor. Anybody who didn't take to Penny at sight would have to be a direct descendant of Herod. She and I are absolutely simpático. She trooped in with Rover at her heels and solemnly helped with the record selection.

We picked out the Crosbys, some Victor Herbert and practically all the Gilbert and Sullivan. We sprawled on the floor with the box of fudge between us and took turns putting the records on six at a time. We were soulfully droning:

"'Is it weakness of intellect, birdie?' I cried,
'Or a rather tough worm in your little inside?'"

when I saw the moppet's hand reach for the box, falter in midsnatch and drop back disinterestedly.

"I know. Me too," I said sympathetically. I dropped the lid coffin-like on the four extant squares.

She went off to take her bath and came back looking like a laundered angel. I tucked her in bed and went back to the living room.

I twiddled the radio dial for my favorite small obscure station. This was the magic hour of radio, I had discovered, when the music enters the room softly and courteously, like a well-bred, welcome guest, bringing with it no strident commercial. The orchestra was playing Beethoven's Fifth and the blend of peace and harmony was so tangible you could have sipped it through a straw like a good malted.

And then the phone rang. I cursed the memory of Alexander Graham Bell as I picked up the receiver. It took a minute to adjust my mood when I heard the voice at the other end.

"Wilma Hathaway MacAdam Brownell! Where on earth ——"

"Right around the corner from you," she chuckled. "I'm perishing to see you if"—her tone dropped a quarter of an octave—"if it's all right to bring Beverly with me. Is it?"

"Look," I said impatiently, "I don't care if you bring the cast of Oklahoma! with you, but get up here—right away!"

Beverly, I thought idly. It struck no chord. I took quick inventory of my present wearing apparel and hoped Wilma hadn't given the girl the old Rosalind Russell build-up. Imagine being promised Rosalind Russell and finding Huckleberry Finn. I decided I really didn't give a hoot. The important thing was that I was going to see Wilma, my dearest friend on this earth.

The first few minutes were a blur wherein Willie and I did a sort of affectionate war dance. Then she pulled Beverly, who'd been standing considerately aside during the reunion scene, over to meet me. She rattled on about how she and Beverly had practically grown up together and how they'd met today by merest chance in Grand Central—wasn't it amazing how things happened?—and how they'd had dinner at that darling little French place in the East Fifties. But none of it really registered. What a cluck I am, I was thinking hopelessly, as I stood wordless and slack-jawed in my po'-white-trash garb. Beverly. Beverly isn't exclusively a female name.

Beverly Chatfield, Lieutenant (j.g.), smiled a wonderful slow smile. "So you're Midge. Willie's favorite person." And you'll see right away what a swell guy he was because he didn't let the slightest startled tinge creep into his nice deep voice (he could so easily have said, "So you're Midge"; all the difference in the world) nor did his eyes pop even the tiniest fraction.

But mine did. Oh, indeed, mine did. I could feel them stretching to take in this towering vision. Thick black hair with just a hint of a front wave, slanted jet eyebrows over quizzical hazel eyes, a straight, blunt nose, one of those mobile, sensitive mouths with humor lurking in the corners, and a firm cleft chin. I know. I know. I sound lush and drooly. And believe me, I felt just that way.

I muttered something about putting on the coffee and staggered out to the kitchen. The two of them came along and I had to tear my fatuous gaze from the vision of Beverly's black hair high against the white doorjamb to listen to Willie's eager, "Fried Bologna and eggs, Midge?"

Somehow, in spite of not being able to breathe normally, I cooked the eggs. Wilma and Beverly were busy with them—I didn't want any myself, between breathlessness and that fudge—when Rover came and stood in the doorway, slowly waving his magnificent plume of a tail and wearing his customary expression of an exiled Irish king. After a few minutes he came straight over and put his muzzle trustfully on the navy-blue knee—Rover, the aloof, the distant, the canine sophisticate!

Beverly looked up from stroking his head. "He's a beauty. What's his name?"

I swallowed and for one weak second I almost failed Jed by answering, "Bairnsfeather's Folly," which is, after all, the name on his pedigree papers. But honesty prevailed and I said tonelessly, knowing how it was going to sound, "His name is Rover."

Oh, wonderful man. He laughed appreciatively. He understood. "Swell! A real dog's name for a real dog, for a change! I had a hound when I was ten and his name was Rover." You see what I mean? The guy was without flaw.

"He belongs to my niece Penny," I explained. "She's eight and, if I do say so as shouldn't, she's a dream boat."

"Oh, Bev, she really is. One of those angel kids. Perfectly adorable. She looks like a medieval page. And she has the I.Q. of a fourteen-year-old without being the least bit Quiz Kid. Is she here, Midge? Could we take a peek later, maybe?"

"Sure," I said, thinking how darling Penny looked in her sleep, curled up like a kitten with her old rubber doll Petticoat in the crook of her arm.

I was pouring more coffee when I heard a sound at the kitchen door.

"Midge." The voice at the door was small and lost-sounding. "Midge. I've been sick, for heaven's sake."

And she had, for heaven's sake. Obviously. All over the striped pajamas. The dream boat. The angel kid. My own stomach heaved convulsively, partly from the power of suggestion, partly from the ignominy of it all. But one look at the poor little chartreuse face and the big, woe-filled eyes made me ashamed of myself. It wasn't the kid's fault. All that fudge, and I'd still made her take the halibut oil. How many times, I wondered bitterly, had they dropped me on my head in infancy? I put a defiant arm around the drooping shoulders. Two outcasts together.

"Come on, goon girl," I said, leading her to the john.

"It happened awfully fast," she explained in the bathroom, while I sponged her off and wrapped her in the big bath towel.

"I know, honey bun. It could happen to anybody. Here, swallow some of this peppermint stuff. It'll make your mouth stop feeling like an old blanket. Come on, now, and we'll hustle you off to bed before grandma gets back."

We reached the bedroom just as Willie was competently smoothing out the fresh sheets. "Hi, ducky. Feeling better?" She gave Penny a sympathetic squeeze. "We split the deck duty, Midge. I changed the sheets—the others are soaking outside—and Bev took over the mopping-up operations."

"Words fail me," I said unevenly. "All I can think of is the line of an old song. Something about a peach of a pair."

"Think nothing of it." Beverly had come back from the kitchen. He bent down to Penny. "How're you feeling, pigeon? Rough deal, wasn't it?"

"Plenty rough," she stated emphatically. "But I'm okay now, thanks." She favored him with a sleepy smile as she climbed between the clean sheets in my pajama top.

And not a minute too soon. I heard mother's key in the lock just as we reached the kitchen. "Company, darling?" she called on her way in. "Oh, it's Wilma. What a nice surprise. And how well you're looking. That's a stunning dress. We haven't seen you for ages, Wilma. What have you been doing with yourself?"

It's funny. There wasn't a thing you could put your finger on, but when mother talked to Willie there was something missing. Oh, the words were right—sweet and cordial—but the essence of her charm was withdrawn. The truth is that my family's attitude about Willie has been my cross in life for years. To put it bluntly, they just plain never shared my enthusiasm for her. Mother and Pat never seemed to be able to understand how a girl like Willie, daughter of the blue-blood Brownells and with all that beauty and money, could be anything but a snob. They started with this misconception before they had ever even met her, and Willie's really staggering shyness when they finally did meet did nothing to dispel the idea. I never could make them understand that Willie dreaded meeting new people and she always acted Ice Maiden as a defense mechanism. Their eyes met past me in wordless agreement, "Naïve, isn't she?"

I am not naïve. Willie and I were roommates at school for four years. You get to know people's characters after four years of living with them, and Willie is the sweetest, most unselfish, loyal friend anybody could have the good fortune to possess. There's not a trace of snob in her. I'm more of a snob than she is—you should hear me prate insufferably about my paternal great-grandfather who was an English lord and who lived in a castle with a moat, no less.

As for my brother Jed—I could expect no support from that source. He has a phobia about beautiful women. He's a commercial artist—or was, before he went into the Army—and he's bored with pulchritude as a kid whose father owns a candy store is bored with chocolate creams. For years we've lived in dread that he'd bring home a lank beige creature and present her as his spouse.

All in all, the encounters between Willie and the family had never been a success.

The warm current flowed back into mother's voice when I introduced Beverly, though. She liked him immediately: the looks, and the clean-cutness and the firm, friendly way he shook her hand. She smiled up at him from somewhere near his right elbow. "The large economy size, huh, lieutenant?"

His laugh boomed out. "That's right, Mrs. Sheridan. Now you're the send-ten-cents-to-cover-the-cost-of-mailing size."

Mother started to grin her gamine grin, and then she got a good look at me. Her eyes groaned as she took in the blinding contrast. Willie, exquisite little Willie in her crisp linen with her shining hair falling in loose waves around the perfectly modeled face; and Ozark Annie in the dungarees and the awful shirt with her face enticingly framed in strained-back pigtails. I had been through the purging fire of shame and had emerged resigned and humble, but I suffered all over again for mother's sake. Still, I was mad because I could see right into her mind where she was unfairly condemning Willie for deliberately framing a setup in which I would be no menace whatsoever. It is one of mother's fond delusions that I am the dark-patrician-beauty type and that men have but to look upon me—properly dressed, of course, and with make-up—to be instantly enslaved. Personally, I couldn't whip up too much interest in a man who thought my looks, even at their best, superior to Willie's. I'd be constantly waiting for them to take him back to the institution.

Willie was trying desperately to act like herself, but her voice came out imitation Hepburn, the way it always does when she's nervous. "I ran into Jed out on the Coast," she said, sounding cool and perfectly controlled, which was a sure sign to me that her knees were practically knocking.

Mother broke down for an unguarded instant. "You did? How did he look? Is he thin? Did he say when he might get home?"

"Well, he did say he expected to get home next month sometime." I caught a wistful overtone in the Hepburn accent. Willie was thinking that it was the first time mother had ever spoken to her as a friend, even though it was by mistake. "You needn't worry about him for a second. He looks so marvelously fit he could pose for physical-culture ads."

"How wonderful to have firsthand news of him." Mother had slipped right back into the old casual-acquaintance groove. She turned to Beverly in explanation. "Jed has been overseas for twenty-six months. He's been stationed out on the Coast for the past three months and we've been out of our minds wondering when he'd get home."

"I sure hope it's soon," Beverly said warmly. "I can imagine how he's felt being away from all this."

They didn't stay much longer. Willie had to go up to Connecticut on some legal business connected with an inheritance from her grandmother—mother's face practically congealed when she came out with that!—then she was going to rejoin her mother in California. Poor Willie, she hates the nomad life, but her parents keep her on the go perpetually. As for my candidate for the Navy's Ideal Man, he had to report to Washington at ten in the morning. I slunk swiftly into bed after their departure. I was in no condition to hear mother's post-mortems on the dégagé appearance of the living room and the scathing description she was set to deliver with me as the subject: me, the blot on the family escutcheon.

And that, I said to myself firmly every day for the next three weeks and two days, very definitely that, and leave us not have any nonsense about it. So the knight in shining armor had come riding, riding, on his white charger—but he had brought his own maiden fair with him, thank you, and my role in the scenario had been that of a dungareed stable boy. So why didn't I skip the whole thing? I had a few whole-souled admirers, didn't I? And not bad, either. There were Duff,

Reflection

BY ELEANOR ALLETTA CHAFFEE

I'm afraid I built my palace
Of unenduring stuff:
I thought that dreams and longing
And wishes were enough.
Now that it lies in ruins,
It's little help to stand
Among the tinsel torn, and know
That it was built on sand,
And that the storm that felled it
Was no larger than your hand!

an Johnson type; and Charlie, who was a vell person; and right here in our own office ere was Bill Hammond, recently discharged om the Marines with dozens of medals, ho had all the female employees swooning t who sent me flowers every other day. So hat was I? A crier after the moon? Why dn't I relax and laugh the whole Beverly isode off as a hilarious anecdote?

And that's what I did. I skipped the hole business, erased it deliberately from y mind. But Michelovsky's accent grew ore turgid, and Minna's lipstick seemed bearably orange, and more carbons went wrong, and I passed up three dates for e Starlight Roof, and at home I broke ur of my irreplaceable French records, and en the roast beef mother got tasted like eat loaf to my uncaring palate.

On Friday I was using words usually re-aced by asterisks as I changed a type-iter ribbon. I had seen Waldo, the office oy, a not-quite-bright character, do this th a few dexterous flicks of the hand, but henever I tried it the darned thing twisted that the red part came up on top and I ound up pushing back wisps of hair from y face with my inked paw.

"Hey, Midge," Minna called from the sk up ahead. "Phone for you. He sounds voooon!"

My knees turned to cooked noodles. inna knew the other voices. Goon, I ught, it couldn't be—he's probably on an ll right now. And how would he know where orked—unless, oh wonderful thought, he had ked Willie. I was annoyed to notice that y hand quivered when I picked up the one. And I was furious when my voice ivered to match. But when I heard his ice—how could I know its every inflection well; I'd only seen the guy for about an ur!—I went completely witless and heard yself saying, "Yes, of course. I'd love to. All ht. Fine. Outside the office at five-fifteen, en." When I hung up limply, then and ly then did I listen to the cold logical part my brain that, even as I spoke, had kept minding me that this was the day I had rn my tired two-year-old blue seersucker d that I hadn't set my hair last night.

Minna, smelling catastrophe, came bus-ng over anxiously. "What's wrong, Midge? an I help?"

"Only," I told her dully, "if your name is udini can you help me."

"Well, it's McGillicuddy, but I can try. hat's up?"

Leadenly I explained, while her kind horse ce grew kinder and horsier. She looked at e—weary seersucker, hair in a practical t-weather bun, typewriter ink all over the sage—and her face lengthened lugubriously.

GEE, it's almost three now. And Mikie's en in a lousy mood all day, otherwise u might be able to pull-something. You uldn't get sick?" she said not too hope-lly.

"Nope," I said, feeling like the maiden forlorn. "He's meeting me in front of the ilding and Mikie would probably just happen along at the psychological moment. Well, anyhow"—I dragged my length up out of the chair—"I'll have to call mother and tell her I won't be home for dinner. Be thinking of some little musty restaurant, Minna, one with dim lights where I might go unnoticed and not disgrace him."

Mother, when I told her the situation and when she'd had a quick flash back of what I'd looked like on my way to work in the morning, was eloquent. "Well, anyhow, for heaven's sake," she cried, "comb out your hair! If you go out in that bun I'll disown you!"

I typed like a zombi, not letting myself feel anything at all, until four o'clock, when Betty called me. Betty is our receptionist. I went out to the desk.

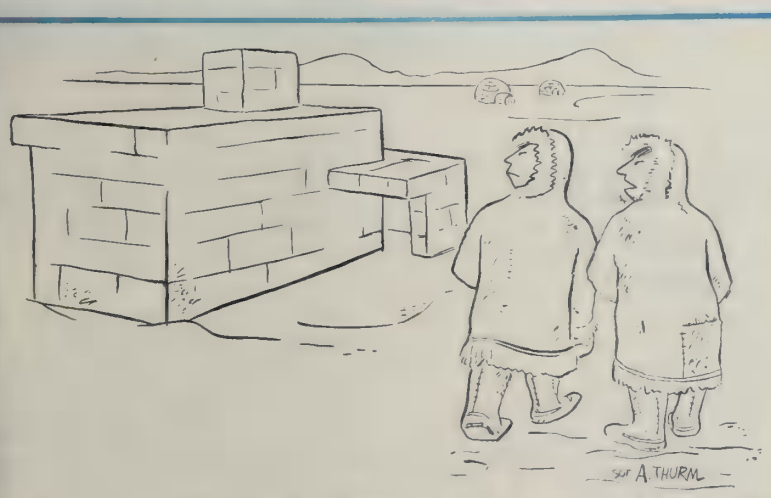
"Why so glum, Midge? You look as though you'd ripped your last pair of nylons. Here's a package your mother left for you."

I looked at it numbly. Package—mother? I pulled clumsily at the string. The contents swam before me in a dreamlike mist. There in the box lay my yellow linen, the one with the square neck and the cap sleeves; with it were a new yellow slip, a wide yellow grosgrain band for my hair, my black suède pumps, mother's own black cordé bag, my black suède shortie gloves and a tiny bottle of heavenly perfume. Also a scrawled note saying, "Sorry I couldn't wait to see your hit-over-the-head expression. Knock him dead, darling!"

Minna beamed when I showed her the miracle. She took a hasty look at her watch.

"Four-fifteen. Nuts to Mikie. We'll go out now and get the show on the road."

She rolled up her loyal sleeves and got to work. And she performed a miracle of her own on my limp locks. When she had finished, my hair fell softly to my shoulders in a perfect page-boy, and with the yellow band securely fastened in place—you wouldn't believe it, it was that good.



The hazel eyes took it all in appreciatively at five-fifteen. To my everlasting gratitude he didn't act paralyzed at the transformation. If he had, the ghost of Ozark Annie would have been heavily between us all night.

As it was, the night was full of enchantment. We had dinner outdoors at the old Claremont Inn and danced for hours without a word under the stars. Our steps blended like a magic formula. We were exactly the right height to dance together, and he broke the silence to smile down and say:

"'What stature is she of? Just as high as my heart.'"

"As You Like It, William Shakespeare, Act III, Scene 2," I said like a pedantic jerk over the sudden banging of my own heart. As if I weren't sunk enough without having him ring in poetry yet! I felt petite, fragile, protected—me, the ex-lifesaver and basketball guard! High as his heart. On all my other dates I was lucky if, with the unobtrusive help of flat heels, I was as high as their eyebrows.

We drifted out finally—when the place was closing—and walked, arms linked, each thinking our own thoughts.

"This is where Tutiak lives. He studied architecture in the States."

And then he told me the things he'd seen in the Pacific—all the strangeness, and the filth, and the bravery, and the terror, and the acid desolation of loneliness, and the treachery that snaked through the long grass in the night. He told it in brutal, rusty words, and I was humble and proud, because I knew these were things he had locked away inside himself, and he had chosen to share them with me, trusting me.

We passed a little Italian parish church whose door stood open patiently. We went in and knelt for a moment to pray. I prayed to thank God for the end of the whole terrible business, and for Minna's Ben coming back after two and a half years. And I thanked God that Jed would be home again for good, and that Beverly—Beverly who knelt so reverently beside me—was finished with that hell of his. And I prayed that I'd stop loving him this way, because he was Willie's, not mine, and I'd already taken something of him from her, because I knew the grim journey his soul had taken.

AND then we got in a cab and he took me home. I put my head wearily on his superior shoulder—it had been quite a day. He kissed me twice, in a gentle brotherly way, and I slept until he woke me at the house.

"Come on in. I'll make you some coffee," I told him.

"It's four-thirty," he said hesitantly.

Four-thirty! Mother would be climbing the walls! We held our breath outside the door while I slid the key in the lock. But before I turned it the door opened and light streamed out into the hall. "Mother, I didn't realize ——" I started, but the next word was smothered against a khaki chest. Jed! Jed! Dear old bearish, temperamental, bad-tempered, wonderful Jed. Home. Actually home! I laughed and cried and snuffled, never loosing my grip on the back of his neck. And then Beverly was handing me a big handkerchief, and mother was beaming with her arm around a strange girl in a brown tailored dress, and saying:

"And they're married, darling. Actually married!"

I took a good look at the girl in the severe brown dress with her hair in an uncluttered upsweep, her feet shod in sturdy oxfords, her lips adorned with the merest hint of demure pink, and her eyes smiling behind round-rimmed glasses. And I did a movie double take.

"W-Willie!" I gasped, as the room swiveled around me. "Willie! You wretch!"

"I know, Midge. I know. Bev and I came up to tell you that night, but mother"—she meant my mother and she gave her arm a loving squeeze as she said it—"came in and shot my plans all to pieces."

I turned to Beverly. "You knew all along?" I asked.

"Sure I knew. But it wasn't up to me to spill it." He sounded worried, wanting me to understand.

I turned back to Willie. "But the masquerade! Why? Somebody please explain why she looks like that!"

Willie explained it herself: "My husband likes me this way. He says I rest his eyes." She smiled up at Jed and even with that insipid pink lipstick, I'd never seen her look more dazzling.

"She's a good kid." That's my brother Jed. Gushy. But the arm he put around her was plenty eloquent.

The party finally broke up about seven o'clock.

I went to the door with Beverly.

"Don't go to work today," he said. "We'll go to the zoo. I want to show you a brown bear that's a ringer for Winnie the Pooh," and he kissed me. But not in a gentle, brotherly fashion. Have you seen Gregory Peck in The Valley of Decision? That'll give you a rough working idea.

Before I let myself sink into sleep, I made two resolutions. One was to go back to the little Italian church and finish the thanking. The other was that any sons of ours would be called Thomas or James or John. Good honest men's names, as Rover was a good forthright dog's name. Positively no Beverly. It was too confusing.

Honey listens to the silence of a birdless winter dawn, when even the dead leaves are waiting for the wind.

Diary of Domesticity

By Gladys Taber

WHEN I was a child, no one had ever heard of organized winter sports. Ski trains and snow trains were undreamed of. The trains that ran through our little town carried people going to Milwaukee to shop, or even as far as Chicago on business; but traveling was a serious thing, not to be undertaken lightly. It involved so much packing and unpacking and tucking washcloths in rubber bags and nightgowns in silk envelope affairs. But now people leap on trains with a small slide-fastened bag and go anywhere. Girls tie their hair up in a scarf, put on slacks and sit happily waxing their skis as the train slides over the winter countryside.

However, we did enjoy winter. There was a horse named Grace who alternately acted as what we called "the hearse horse" and as a puller of a long homemade bobsled. The sled belonged to a boy named Eugene, and as soon as snow began to pile up along the fences everyone began to do special favors for Eugene. It was a little odd, but I never got "mad with" Eugene in sleighing time. In midsummer I might become involved in those strange adolescent sufferings, but not in January. We would bundle up in galoshes and Mackinaws and woolen hoods and fur mittens and pile on the bobsled and Grace would move slowly down the snowy streets, earning her twenty-five cents an hour the easy way.

The air was always like a clean quick knife blade, and the sun frozen gold, and the shadows of the snow ruts fell blue behind us. We sang Long Long Trail, and I was almost in tune but not quite. The boys fell off and scuffled in the snow and threw snowballs, and if a boy was really wild about you he showed his ardor by putting snow down your neck. And at the end of the afternoon we went home for oyster stew and hot buttered crackers, cocoa and cake.

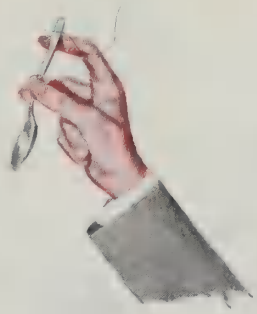
Oyster stew was really oyster stew then. Mother made it by melting half a cup of butter in a big heavy pan. She added a quart of oysters and let them just come to a boil, then poured over them three cups of milk and a cup of cream, a teaspoon of salt, half a teaspoon of pepper. This simmered just until the oysters began to rise to the top, then it was served in hot bowls with parsley an paprika, and often more butter on top!

When she made cocoa she used coffee place of water for the recipe, and added little cinnamon. It was spicy and rich ar we consumed quarts of it.

We used to have winter picnics too. Th involved a long ride on a streetcar, a hil through the woods, carrying all our supplie and a struggle to get the door open to a sur mer cottage by the lake. The parents thoug we were demented and expected us to g pneumonia, but perseverance usually w out and we could go, if we came home befo dark. Nothing in the world, I am sure, is cold as a summer cottage in January. It far colder than outdoors, colder than an A pine hut. Building the fire was a mammo task. The fireplace smoked from the col the wood was covered with snow that melt and ran into the small flame. But in the en after much harder work than our paren ever got from us, we had a fire. A lovely b blazing fire. Then we unpacked the lun and thawed it out, and cooked smoky ha burgers and frankfurters and boiled coff madly with eggshells.

We sat around the fire, still wrapped in s teen layers of clothing, and ate and talk the queer talk of youth. Outside, the la stretched its miles of frozen gray-green. T shores of Fond du Lac were cold against t horizon. The line of closed summer cottag was dark and still, and the sound of c voices echoed along empty verandas.

"What did you ever find to do when y were growing up?" the children ask as th dash from movie to movie, dance to dance.



"Oh, we used to go on winter picnics," say.

"But what for?"

Here at Stillmeadow, we are almo snowed in by mid-January. When the neig bors are coming over for dinner, there is ways a chance that a blizzard will come fi The freezer really comes into its own now. we have dinner for ten and only three through the storm, the extra food can right down in the freezer for another d And then if unexpected guests arrive, th is always fresh asparagus or peas ready

Worth Celebrating

It's a treat worth celebrating when the family shopper turns up with more Canada Dry Ginger Ale. The tingling goodness and sprightly flavor of "the Champagne of Ginger Ales" lend holiday zest to everyday living. True, it's sometimes hard to get Canada Dry these days. But when you do, it's the same delicious, sparkling refresher you've always known. In changing times, its quality has remained unchanged.

The sugar shortage continues to curtail production of Canada Dry Ginger Ale. Since Canada Dry believes it is fairer to distribute this limited supply equitably to all areas, your dealer may occasionally be short. Just keep on asking for it.

lift out and heat. Jill has always several roasting chickens stuffed and ready for the oven, as well as broilers and fryers. The main trick in freezing successfully is to be sure the food is sealed. If air gets in the container, the cold draws the moisture from the food and it is dehydrated, getting freezer burn. We always test our sealed edges carefully when we put the food in.

But the kitchen is sweet with herbs and simmering soups. And for New Year's a ham. I boil the ham first, with a bottle of ginger ale in the water. I allow thirty minutes per pound for simmering, and never let it boil hard. When it is done, I put it in a roasting pan in a hot oven for twenty-five minutes. (The skin should be taken off first.) The ham may be studded with cloves and covered with brown sugar and a little dry mustard, and basted with cider.

We like it equally well with molasses for the glaze. There are really endless variations to the baking. Cooked apricots and prunes may be used, and the juice poured over when basting. Tart spicy jelly is good. Or pineapple slices laid on top and sprinkled with brown sugar.

Scalloped potatoes go well with ham, and are good for a winter party because if someone is late, the dinner won't spoil. For dessert we like something simple—so a big wooden bowl of frosty fruit and a blue Wedgwood dish with cheese and brown crackers are my choice.

When we are at home on New Year's afternoon to the neighbors, we can have this dinner for the special guests who will spend the evening and probably stay all night, and still have time enough to visit without secret dashes to the stove every few minutes. All my holiday cooking is based on food that can hold its own without much coddling.

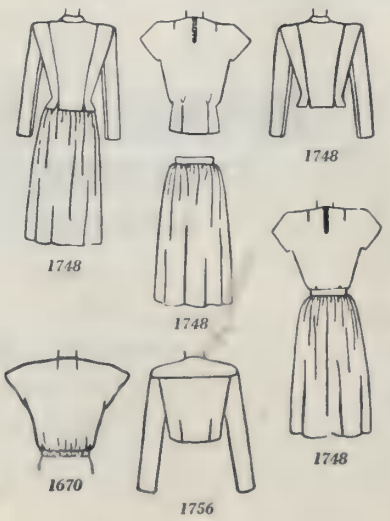
The summer flowers are a memory now, but the house still looks loved with the green arrangements in the shining copper bowl. We pick pine, several kinds to get varied texture, and use bittersweet or sumac for color. I measure the length and width of the low container, add these together, and use that measurement for the height of the main pine stem. A needle holder keeps it in place. For a taller vase, twice the height of the container is right for the main line.

If you can get galax leaves or magnolia, you are even more fortunate, or Western pine. And if you have flowering house plants, steal three blossoms and use them low down as a focal point. Rosy geraniums are lovely with the dark softness of the green.

After the party is over, the dishes should be stacked on trays to carry to the kitchen. I am always surprised at how many women keep house without using trays. One tray saves hundreds of steps and much time. Dishwashing can wait if things are cleared away neatly.

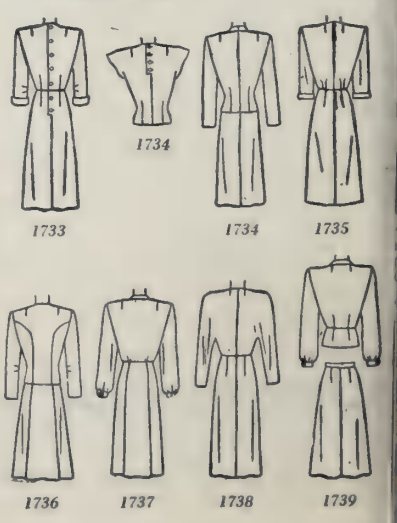
Then it is a good thing to curl up with a book for a little while until bedtime. I like James Russell Lowell saying "Solitude is as needful to the imagination as society is wholesome for the character." We all need to spend some time alone; people who cannot bear their own company for a time have thin souls.

The deep part of winter gives most of us a little more time alone. The natural rhythm of time has changed from summer. But instead of dreading the dark winter days, we ought to savor them for what they can give. Now there should be opportunity to reread old books, to absorb some philosophy, to play a whole symphony without hurrying.



We need to revalue living in these afterwar days. We now know that the end of war was no blessed millennium. The world is still in the midst of endless conflict, much of it purposeless and stupid. We may never see a stable world economy, a really liberated people, or nations acting with good will toward one another. We can try, and we can pray that enough wisdom will somehow be granted mankind to preserve it from eternal destruction.

Yesterday I struggled through the deep snow to the brook, with Honey floundering after me. She went like a seal in surf, a golden seal in a white surf. Down in the hollow the tall dead weeds are still standing, the color of old bronze and saffron and beaver brown. There were the delicate prints of a rabbit and the wild light touch of a fox in the still snow. How strange the silence sounds when the birds are gone to far places! And yet to a careful ear, there are special sounds that are lovely. The sound of running water under the ice sheath of the brook is one, and Honey and I stopped to listen to it. It has a magic all its own, the sound of living water. Where the ice is nothing but lace, I can look down and see the black brook water thrusting its course over the cold rock.



And this is a wonderful thing at the end of an old year, at the beginning of a new year, to see how the brook flows on. I tell Honey about it and she lifts her dark amber eyes and looks at me steadily. There is enough beauty in this world, I tell her, for every man to brim his heart with. And all we have to do is put away the hard things of life a while and look at our world all over again.

CAREER GIRLS CAN COOK

valuable time, it doesn't take much thought. Remove chocolate mixture from the heat when it's nice and thick. Cool.

Last act: Fold in 3 egg whites, stiffly beaten. Line an oblong dish with graham crackers. (We used 9 crackers to a layer.) Cover with half the chocolate mixture. Add another layer of crackers, another of chocolate and top with a third layer of crackers. Chill overnight in refrigerator. Slice or cut into squares. Serve with or without whipped cream. Serves 6. For a larger cake, double the quantities. Vanilla wafers may be substituted, but they make a sweeter dessert.

Sunday-morning leisure. Sunday mornings are cherished by any career girl, and not just because of the extra hour or two of sleep. A leisurely breakfast in slacks or negligee, a walk in the park, a session with the Sunday paper are all part of a pleasant pattern. Janie is a great believer in a good breakfast—every day—but it's only on Sunday that Caffie and Gretchen really go in for the institution with any amount of enthusiasm. Here's an easy little egg trick that will give your breakfast meal that sort of special Sunday-morning look—and taste.

CRISPY EGGS

Fry 2 slices bacon. When crisp, crumble them up and mix with 1 cup cereal flakes. Season lightly with salt and pepper and toss together with about 1 tablespoon bacon fat. Grease 4 custard cups with some of the bacon fat. Put part of the bacon flakes in the bottoms of custard cups. Break an egg into each, keeping yolk whole. Sprinkle with a little salt and pepper. Sprinkle the rest of the flakes on top. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., about five minutes.

Miracles in a double boiler. If there's one piece of equipment that really earns its keep in a small apartment kitchen, it's the double boiler. It serves as a heater-upper for rolls, sauces, canned vegetables and soups, and all the many frozen cooked-food combinations. You can scramble eggs in it that are "divinely" creamy, create puddings in its top while a soup simmers in its base; and of all things, you can even make a cake in it. All the action takes place right in the precious gadget. The process is so simple you'll wonder why you've always thought cake-making was something you'd leave to the gals who've had loads of experience. This one will net you laurels—not to mention dates.

DOUBLE-BOILER CHOCOLATE CAKE

Put ¼ cup shortening, ½ cup water and 2 squares unsweetened chocolate in the top of the double boiler. Heat until chocolate is melted and add 1 cup sugar. Blend well and cool the top part of the boiler in a pan of cold water. If you're really in a hurry, let a few ice cubes do the chilling faster. When chocolate mixture is cool, add 1 egg. Beat up well with egg beater. All this still happens right in top of double boiler, remember. Sift together 1 cup flour, ½ teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon baking powder, ¼ teaspoon baking soda. Add the sifted dry ingredients all at once. Beat with spoon vigorously until smooth. Add 1 teaspoon vanilla and ¼ cup sour milk or buttermilk. Beat smooth again. If you haven't any sour milk, add ¼ teaspoon vinegar to sweet milk. Pour batter into a greased nine-inch layer-cake pan or piepan. Bake twenty-five to thirty minutes in moderately hot oven, 375° F. Cool in the pan. Frost if desired. You might like to serve it with butterscotch cream—3 tablespoons brown sugar folded into ½ pint heavy cream, whipped until stiff.

On their own. For these three, spending a Sunday afternoon cooking up a chile supper or unraveling the mysteries of a previously untried recipe in the St. Joe Junior League cookbook is fun. "When you're famished, it's wonderful," sighs Janie. If their mothers could only see them now. Not experts yet, but bright beginners with a culinary eye on their own "someday" homes, these three are plunging in on their own. Career girls mostly do.

TELL ME THAT YOU LOVE ME

Nancy was by then getting supper in the kitchen—cold meat and salad and iced tea. When it was ready, they ate, Nancy in her slip because she had the dishes to do and didn't want to spot her dress.

Spearing a radish out of the salad bowl, Joel said, "Tell me something, Mrs. Pane. Why do girls want to be getting compliments all the time?"

Nancy's eyes flickered. "Don't start that again, Joel."

"But I'm serious. You're always complaining, and I'd like to find out what's at the bottom of it." He bit noisily into the radish. "Now you take men. You don't hear men going around moaning because ——"

Nancy had stopped eating and was staring at him. "Joel. You're not really that dense."

"Don't change the subject."

"Joel. A long time ago, before we were married, you said you thought there was a lot more fun in being married than most people seemed to get out of it, and you intended to have it, but it wasn't something that would happen by itself. You said we'd have to work at it and use our heads."

He nodded. "That's right."

"Well?"

"And that's exactly what I'm trying to do. But I don't get any co-operation."

Nancy sighed hopelessly and resumed eating. "All right. Talk about something else, Joel, please! Or don't talk at all. I can't stand you when you get like this."

Belligerently: "Like what?"

Silence.

A small love forgives much; a great love forgives little; and a perfect love forgives all.

—ELLEN THORNECROFT FOWLER.

---

Joel glared at Nancy, then caught himself up short. After a moment he said conciliatingly, "Okay, Mrs. Pane. Forget it." He patted her arm. "No hard feelings?"

She looked up and smiled. "No hard feelings."

But later, while Nancy finished dressing, he brooded about it, about Nancy and himself, trying to think it through.

He knew, though he might not admit it to her, that Nancy had some reason to complain. Uplifted by the excitement of falling in love, becoming engaged, he'd been a satisfactorily demonstrative lover. Once married, he'd settled down with something like relief to being a husband. When Nancy objected, he felt she was being unreasonable. His attempts to make this clear to Nancy weren't, however, conspicuously successful.

Yet, unreasonable as she might occasionally seem to him, he knew that Nancy's instincts in this were a better guide than his own. In such matters girls were infinitely more civilized than the men they married.

But it had always been hard for him to show or express affection. His childhood hadn't encouraged such displays. You were given to understand very early in life that it wasn't manly—or safe—to show your feelings, especially of the tenderer kind. Your real he-man was the strong silent type who considered girls excessively silly creatures and was convinced that they secretly adored rough-hewn cavemen. Nancy had already taught him that girls didn't.

All of which explained—if it did—without excusing. As a young man who appreciated what he had and wanted to keep it, he recognized the wisdom of behaving less like a husband and more like the grown-up and presumably civilized man he was. And surely the easy and graceful expression of affection was one of the distinguishing marks of a civilized adult? For his own sake as much as Nancy's, since their happiness was indivisible. But it wasn't going to be easy.

Listen to her in there, he thought. She was humming to herself. You'd think she was going to some splendid high-society affair downtown instead of to a neighborhood movie. She was as excited about dressing up and going out with him on a Saturday night as if he were a movie hero taking her to a glamorous night club or something. Thought he was wonderful. Always telling him so, anyway.

He sat up suddenly. After a moment he muttered to himself. She was always telling him he was wonderful. He couldn't put on a new necktie or do an odd job around the house without being praised for his remarkable superiority to the general run of husbands. He'd heard it so often that he'd even begun to think he was something rather special in that line himself. But when Nancy complained that he never gave her a word of appreciation he told her she was being feminine and silly.

I'm a dope, he thought.

Nancy came into the living room, skirt swirling. "I'm ready."

Joel rose and got into his jacket.

Nancy straightened his tie. "I love you in this suit," she said. "You always look so well in light colors."

There she goes again, he reflected, looking down at her.

She was wearing a white dress scattered with large flowers, and she'd put another flower in her hair, which was no longer in pigtails but dropped in soft, shining waves almost to her shoulders. She even smelled a little like a flower herself.

He swallowed. "You're awfully pretty."

Her lashes flew up. "Why, Joel!"

He felt as awkward and tongue-tied as an adolescent trying to promote a kiss from his first girl. Worse. This was almost like getting sentimental with a member of one's own family.

He put out an arm; then, as if to disguise his first intention, he caught her hand. "Let's dance." The radio was playing a waltz. They moved together over the rug, Nancy's cheek against his shoulder.

"Listen, sweetheart," he began, and stopped. Then he tried again. "Look, Nancy. Never get the idea that I don't think the world of you."

"I know you do. I don't mean to nag."

"A little nagging won't do any harm. I've got a lot to learn."

"Only you can be so nice when you want to be. And if you only realized how it makes me feel!"

He kissed her and then, his lips brushing her hair, he murmured, "I do love you, sweetheart. Honest. But you're the first girl I ever loved this much, and I don't always know how to act or what to say."

"Just tell me that you love me."

"There's more to it than that. I've got something here with you so precious it scares me." His arm tightened around her. "You think I take you too much for granted. You couldn't be wronger. I always know when you're around. I'm always noticing something about you, the way you look, the things you say. Even when I'm away from you, just thinking about you knowing I'll be seeing you soon, is like a song inside me."

Nancy looked up, her eyes shining.

Joel smiled at her crookedly. "So you see, Mrs. Pane, it's not that I don't feel things like that about you. I've just never learned to say them. But from now on I'll try to remember not to keep them to myself. From now on, I'm a reformed character."

"You can be so nice when you want to be," Nancy whispered.

He kissed her again, and then they realized the music had stopped and that someone was talking about headache pills.

Nancy was a bit breathless. "I must look a mess," she said. "And you're all over lipstick. Give me your handkerchief."

She made him presentable, then examined herself in the mirror, repaired damages visible only to her own all-seeing eye.

"There, that's better."

"Let's get going, then. I don't want to have to stand in line." He snapped off the radio.

"How do I look?"

"Not bad." And patted her fanny.

PHOTOGRAPH BY HAROLD FOWLER

New sectional furniture, a last-minute scheme and the latest tricks in grouping are shown in this room by decorator John Gerald.

New Beginnings

HERE is a room that looks ahead with an eye to trends. This delightful and prophetic setting for young marrieds was planned by decorator John Gerald, who feels that young couples today are being realistic about their furnishings; starting simply, as the color photograph suggests, they add the frills as they go along.

There are three new features presented in this room, each important and to be taken into account in practically all decoration plans. These developments are: Sectional furniture which you can buy unit by unit, to suit your needs or your budget. Light, bright color schemes which use several hues together. Pushed-back furniture arrangements in average and small rooms.

Sectional Furniture consists of independent units of drawers, shelves and cabinets of various sizes, colors and proportions, which you assemble to suit your taste, your floor plan and your personal requirements. The red chest in the photograph is just one of an entire group of such pieces planned for living room, dining room and bedroom use.

It is an add-to idea, convenient not only because of its adaptability to a set space, but with the practical charm of expanding gracefully as your possessions grow. If you have ever tried to fit bulky furniture into limited spaces and have it look well, you can see how sectional furniture helps with the problem.

Here are a few particulars: The drawers are different depths, and stack to make a "custom-built" chest. There are sections that open up like cupboards and combine with the drawers to make large pieces like the one illustrated. The finish is usually a satiny lacquer in decorator colors—persimmon red, lime green, black and pearl gray—showing the trend toward colored finishes in furniture. Lacquered wood is surprisingly good decoration, and attractive against either a plain or patterned wall.

Another variation of this furniture that grows is the continuing sectional bookshelf, like the one pictured under the window. In blond mahogany or color, you can buy it piece by piece and use the sections in as many ways as your imagination suggests. Beneath windows they use blank space and become part of the decorative background—really look built-in, therefore modern and new. Sectional sofas you have seen before, but this one is curved to round a corner or compose a group. You can buy the sections singly to use as chairs, arrange in pairs for love seats, or group several to make a big crescent in front of the fireplace.

Line Arrangement is the second new feature of rooms to come. The "pushed back" placement of chests, shelves and cabinet furniture keeps a room from looking cluttered, leaves space to move about. With the center space opened up, even a small room looks larger and emphasis is taken from the walls themselves, an asset in rooms not architecturally superior. It is new, also, to arrange chairs and sofa in a crescent, continuous or broken with lamps and tables at convenient intervals.

Bright Color Schemes are the third style note. Forthcoming colors are gay and vibrant. The clear tones make rooms look fresh, new—definitely postwar. The new colors are Nature tones, beautiful in themselves, intriguing in their soft richness, glowing and subtle, rather than just bright colors of any hue. They resemble flowers, fruits, foliage, and are named for them. You can use almost any combination of these fresh new colors, and they appear compatible, like flowers in a bouquet.

Revere COPPER-CLAD STAINLESS STEEL Ware

The first time you use Revere Ware you will realize why the fortunate women who bought these cooking utensils before the war call them "Kitchen Jewels". It is so much easier to cook the Revere "waterless" way. The heavy copper bottoms of the pans heat up so quickly and so evenly. You save time. You save fuel. You save the natural vitamins and minerals. After use, soap and water are usually all that it takes to restore the silver-like lustre. Before you buy cooking utensils, look at the original Revere copper-clad stainless steel Ware, particularly if you want lasting service. Millions of women have used Revere Ware for more than seven years with no report yet of a single utensil wearing out.

MEET THREE CAREER GIRLS

trees. The dean took this news calmly, perhaps because Gretchen was a considerable campus asset herself—a member of Student Council, Mortar Board, Little Theater, with excess steam dissipated in helping out at day-care centers and setting up the first Students' Commons, or recreation hall, in the history of the college.

Gretchen never, never wants her mind to grow rusty, she explains in her dramatically husky voice. She wants to do "a cracking good job" in raising four children, to plunge into community activities, to learn more and more about music and art. She wants to live far enough in the country where there are always picnics and bonfires and hills with views.

"But oh," she ends with a wail, "I don't want to be a clubwoman! I wish I had a pale, wan, interesting face and spent all my time with little-theater groups."

Such outbursts generally occur after a nine-hour day coping with hordes of war-released workers swarming into American Express for jobs. Gretchen has her eye cocked toward foreign service, just in case she doesn't settle right away for that life in the country with a certain Navy lieutenant now overseas. "American Express has never sent a woman abroad yet," she despairs; but then, they never had a woman personnel assistant either.

Janie is luckiest in having crashed a field where opposition to women is at a minimum. "Can you imagine a man writing a nail-polish or perfume ad?" asks Janie. "In advertising, women's talents are respected; they earn just as much as men and can go just as high. It's not like some businesses, say banking, where women just don't have the flair."

Darkly pretty Caffie, who spends her days in the tiptoe cathedral-like gloom of the vaulted Guaranty Trust, is inclined to agree with her. She works in a department with about fifty other bright young college women, imported in recent years to take the place of bright young college men who departed for war. Caffie takes a dim view of the future of women in banking, and makes no bones of her present intense interest in matrimony.

Although Janie generously brings home droves of young advertising tycoons, Caffie finds them somewhat of a strain. "I feel as if I have to effervesce and be giddy all evening." She is looking for someone who can be fun, and yet sweet and sincere. "The Jimmy Stewart type," she says serenely.

Such talk is like a nail drawn across a blackboard to career-minded Janie. "Honestly!" she explodes. "Can you imagine kissing some guy good-by every morning and walking over to a sinkful of dirty dishes? Not for me! Maybe later. Not now." Her vivid face becomes serious. "Caffie, you'd better get interested in a job. A girl doesn't know what the future holds these days. Why, you may have to work until you're twenty-five!"

When they aren't discussing their jobs, the three roommates chew their nails over How to Get a Lease, their most unsolvable problem so far. Their first six months working, they unpacked their belongings in four different apartments—including one which was theirs for two weeks—and barely escaped pitching a tent in between discoveries, such is the incredible housing squeeze today in New York.

Now, finally, they have a gem of a place near the East River at 425 E. 72nd Street—if only the owner doesn't decide suddenly to move back! Four rooms (one bedroom) cost $125 a month, without utilities, and they all take turns sleeping on the studio couch in the living room. Against the pale pastel walls and Venetian blinds, the modern blond furniture and flowered slip covers look elegant and gay. "They should," remarks Caffie grimly. "We feel they should be gold-plated."

First one home at night—usually Janie—does the marketing, repaying herself from the "kitty" where they each put $15 a month for food and household laundry. Fortunately, they all love inexpensive dishes like chile con carne (Missouri style) and mulligan stew, which does two nights. Next girl home pitches in with the cooking, and the third with the cleaning up.

Caffie and Janie are very neat; Gretchen is apt to wash the dishes and leave the pots. "This is horrible! This isn't living!" she was heard to cry once, scrubbing the frying pan. All heavy housecleaning is left for Saturday afternoon, when they tackle it together.

They get along remarkably well, with one fairly hard-and-fast rule: no borrowing of money or clothes, although Janie urges them to wear her quite large collection of hats. All of them found their college wardrobes "much too campusy" for the city, but only Janie has bought many clothes. "I'm a terrible spender," she remarks philosophically. Right now she is trying to rent a piano for her composing, "mostly light, sentimental stuff." The two others, by stringently budgeting every cent, just about manage to get by without help from home. There just isn't room on their budgets for hospitalization or insurance, or savings.

About the only splurging is an occasional concert at Carnegie, the Philharmonic or a Broadway show. Sundays they lounge around in flannel robes and slippers listening to the symphony with the papers, or go for a long walk. Sometimes, on the way home from work, Caffie slips into a bowling alley—an unexciting substitute, she finds, for the tennis, golf and riding she adores.

"It's a funny thing about a glamorous place like New York," says Caffie with surprise. "Most everybody's in a rut."

Janie, who never wants to live anywhere else, disagrees violently. "You can meet the same kind of people here you do back home. New York's just a series of hick towns. It's full of people from Missouri."

But about the only thing that reminds Caffie forcibly of home is slipping into St. Bartholomew's and listening to the beautiful, well-remembered service. Was this the kind of exciting career-girl existence she had pictured at college? Up at seven, a race to the subway still chewing a piece of toast, charts, figures, ink-smudged fingers, back home to cook, wash dishes. Then an evening of preparing for the next day—nails and hair to be fixed, blouses to be washed and pressed. And so to bed—too tired even to read the paper.

Like Caffie, Gretchen is up early, grabs a coffee-and-fruit breakfast, has a thirty-minute subway ride to the heart of New York's great financial district. In these soul-trying days for personnel directors, she often starves for lunch until three, is back at her desk until seven.

Caffie never pokes her head out into the air all day and grouses that even in the company cafeteria, where she gets lunches free, there isn't a man under fifty within shouting or shooting distance.

Janie, on the other hand, rises late, breakfasts leisurely, gets to work at 9:30 and departs in an hour or so for a second breakfast and coffee at Stouffers with her fellow workers. Saturdays she doesn't work at all.

"Advertising people are so stimulating!" glows Janie. "Everybody's either an artist in his own right or a terrific selling personality. Those men on the paper back home—the ones who told me I'd never get a job in New York—no wonder they're still earning fifty dollars a week after twenty-f years on the same job."

"H'm-m," says Gretchen. "Look at th moon. What a night for a hay ride!"

Caffie looks up thoughtfully from l mending. "You know, back home nobo seemed to be in a rut."

It looks as though St. Joseph (pop. 75,0 chief industries: pork packing, ornamen ironwork and stoves) is beginning to acqu some real glamour in the eyes of at least t little homesick maids from school.

THREE TO GET READY!

If you, like Janie, Caffie and Gretchen, have put perfect grooming high on your list of New Year promises to yourself, here are some tips to check your own notions against:

SKELETONS IN YOUR CLOSET?

No one but Fibber McGee ever brought any good out of a cluttered closet. Keep your closet well dressed and it will do the same for you.

Basic closet wardrobe: At least one garment bag for seldom-used clothes, a hatbox or two for ditto hats. (Transparent ones are a great help to folks in a hurry.) A shoe bag or rack, shoe trees, a really shapely hanger for every garment, plus skirt hangers if you're a suit girl, pants hangers for slacks, and hatstands. Shelves, of course, and a rod, arranged so that longies hang at one end, skirts, blouses and jackets at the other.

A well-planned closet uses every inch of its space in orderly fashion without crowding. For its soul, give it fragrant sachets suspended from the hangers, or paint hangers and shelves with scented lacquer.

NEAT TRICKS:

Deciding the night before what you'll wear next morning, pressing it and getting its accessories into apple-pie order then is, to be sure, the neatest trick of the week. But if you late-date and are just too sleepy, leap up at the alarm's first peep, lest you go off looking like Shaggy Maggy . . . and you may meet your dream man or dream job that day.

Three-o'clock-in-the-morning blues is another reason why it's a good idea to wash stockings, gloves and panties when you change after coming home from the office.

Before closeting the dress you've worn all day, give it a breathing spell overnight in front of an open window.

Keeping slips, gowns and panties in transparent lingerie cases can make you feel like "the lass with the delicate air"—a pleasant feeling. Tuck a sachet in them.

Have one "loneliest night in the week" (Monday's a good one for most girls) when you eagle-eye everything you own for loose snaps, buttons off, draggly hems, and so on. And sit right down beside your mending basket then and fix them! This, too, is the night to lay out clothes that should go to the cleaners.

BLESSING UPON BRUSHES:

How could we be beautiful without 'em? Have you a clothesbrush, a shoebrush, a hatbrush, a hairbrush? And a complexion brush, a nailbrush, a lipstick brush? Keep a special soft nailbrush for scrubbing your girdle, especially the insides of the garters. Slip straps too often need the brush-off. Hairbrushes and combs must be scrupulously clean. Wash in lukewarm water, plenty of mild soapsuds. Rinse well and dry brushes right side up away from heat.

QUICKIES:

Since sleeve protectors must be daily editions, else they defeat their own purpose, use the pin-in kind. They're good at making quick entrances and exits. Sew snaps on the shoulder pads of washable dresses. It's a big timesaver, and you're sure about getting them back in the right places.

Carry run-stop, in a case no bigger than a lipstick, in your handbag. It can be a friend in need when you're on your way to a date, and zing, away runs your stocking!

PRESSING ENGAGEMENT:

While pressing before dressing is a f fastidious habit, pause first to make su that you're not sealing soil in. Heat may oil and grime stains on some fabrics beyo all hope of removal.

A steam iron—now there's a friendly thi that really has a girl's interest at heart. W it you may iron on the right side, withou press cloth—especially good news to a who wears suits a lot.

A steam iron likes the light touch, for t steam really does the pressing. Follow contour—nothing is completely flat. A plus press mitt will be worth its weight in gold smoothing rounded shoulder areas. But could manage with a well-padded sle board or a rolled-up Turkish towel.

To revive skirts that show they fought the battle of the back bulge, p vertically across the board, toward the cen back seam, with the placket closed and se laid absolutely straight. Place the iron gen then lift. Repeat on the same spot until get a lively whirl of steam. Lift from the bo while the steam is still puffing. Care don't stretch it again! Lay it flat until c pletely dry before hanging it up.

Don't iron-press bumpy crepes, stret jerseys or velvet. Place such dresses tidily hangers, with all plackets zipped, should stuffed with tissue, and let them hang the bathroom while you take a hot, stea bath or shower. Afterward hang them aw from contact with the steamy walls. The be perky again!

LAUNDRY À LA WASHBOWL:

Keep mild soap flakes in a pretty jar part of your bathroom décor. There nice little gadgets, like hoops wi han tops, equipped with nipper clothespins, hold up your overnight laundry in the le possible space, tidily.

Wash white fabric or doeskin gloves ri on your hands, using a soft brush to cl soiled finger tips in a jiffy. The trick to ke ing doeskins soft is to catch 'em just be they're completely dry and finger-p them. Some say that a bit of soap in the rinse water is softening too.

ON-THE-SPOT REPORTING:

Lipstick Division: To remove stains fr white cotton or linen, rub first with pe leum jelly, then wash in hot suds. If c remains, bleach with peroxide. GORSKA

ELSIE LEE, author of Secretary to Mr. Bluebeard, says: "I am incurably domestic and frighteningly competent, even though my husband may bear witness against the fact. Three years ago I made him a pair of pajamas and he still asks me wistfully to turn up the cuffs four inches so that he can find his hand. We collect nothing but phonograph records, of which we have far too many for the size of our apartment; but as music is as necessary as air to me, this is hardly a hobby. My pet bugaboos are Sundays, any hour before eleven A.M., and my hair, which has a phobia against staying put. I like to think I have the vile temper of true genius, but nobody pays attention to me!"

WILDING

DOROTHY WALWORTH says: "I was born of Protestant ministers, and know all about the church and life in a parsonage. My one ambition has always been to write, and if I had my life to live over again, I would still write. An editor-husband, a daughter and a kitten like the one in Nicodemus have been my pet loves; plus hats, mysteries, puzzles, and the theory that women have done a better job than they've been given credit for. Life, I believe, opens out, and should continue to open out always. My forties are far more fascinating than my twenties were—which I keep trying to tell young people, but they don't believe me!"

HOPE HALE (Love is That Way) says: "Before I married a professor and the campus of Smith College, I assaulted New York's advertising and publishing world, and sent myself to Europe on the proceeds of drawings. Now I juggle domesticity and writing—and any home with two parents, a four-year-old male and a preadolescent blonde provides enough grist in one day for a writing lifetime. Moreover, there are the intermissions of my husband's seminars at which I can observe the heroines of today's romances eating raw carrots and homemade doughnuts around our fireplace."

PET HATES AND PET LIKES

BY JUDITH CHASE

EVERYONE has a right to his pet peeves—as much as his personal preferences. Usually both are kept pretty much on the q.t. and crop up only when the occasion arises. Rarely are they aired all at once. To discover just what these 23 well-known men and women would like in their lives and what they'd put on their black lists, we've pried into their pet peeves and pet likes. They all have definite ideas. Some you'll agree with, some you won't. But at any rate, you'll learn things you never suspected about these celebrities.

IDA LUPINO

Dislikes: People who treat me as though they expected me to fall in a screaming fit every ten seconds. I'm an actress and I've played some neurotic parts, but—honest—I was acting.

Likes: A picture, silver candlesticks, some little thing to perk up a corner. I have cupboards full of stuff I can't use, but I still buy these things.

NINO MARTINI

Dislikes: Warm wine and cold soup.

Likes: A new joke.

LISA SERGIO

Dislikes: Some of my least ladylike instincts are aroused when somebody proceeds to kill a cigarette stub in a saucer that is already dripping with tea or coffee.

Likes: One of my "likes" is driving a car at night when the roads are deserted and the trees are whispering among themselves.

HELEN JEPSON

Dislikes: Lukewarm coffee.

Likes: Any new words my two-year-old son learns to say.

STUART CLOETE

Dislikes: Men's clothes.

Likes: All animals except bears.

ARTHUR POUND

Dislikes: Mayonnaise.

Likes: Homemade sausage and fried potatoes for breakfast.

FRANCES PARKINSON KEYES

Dislikes: A single bed—I like to sleep across a big one. Hospital beds represent instruments of torture to me because of their height and narrowness. I have fallen out of three of these, once with quite disastrous results.

Likes: Travel by anything except trains.

STANLEY WALKER

Dislikes: People who say F. D. Roosevelt was the greatest American President.

Likes: Women who have sense enough to flatter me.

DAWN POWELL

Dislikes: The same people for dinner that I had for cocktails.

Likes: People who will not let me confide in them (I am always glad later).

SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

Dislikes: Whimsical plays such as HARVEY.

Likes: Pigtails for young girls.

PEGGY BACON

Dislikes: Cat-lovers.

Likes: Cats.

CONSTANCE BENNETT

Dislikes: Things that crawl or creep.

Likes: Spinach. I really do.

FRANK KINGDON

Dislikes: Small tables in restaurants and clubs which give me claustrophobia of my long legs.

Likes: Romping with my grandchildren—and then that moment of wonderful relief after they go to bed.

BARBARA STANWYCK

Dislikes: Figs and prunes. They always seem so wrinkled and hopeless.

Likes: Sleeping late. When I'm not working, I sleep the sleep of the exhausted—late and long.

RUTH HUSSEY

Dislikes: Stuffed olives sliced in gelatin salads. They look like eyes.

Likes: Stories about leprechauns.

EZRA STONE

Dislikes: Autograph hounds with leaking pens. Buttons that pop off just when you think you're losing weight.

Likes: Fans who don't ask me to crack my voice or say, "Coming, mother!" Hot garlic bread.

JOSEPH DRISCOLL

Dislikes: RUDENESS. After covering the war throughout the world for the last four years, I am amazed at the rudeness of the so-called average American back home. The American boys overseas on the front lines were generally courteous and considerate to everybody but the enemy. Some rudeness began to develop among rear-echelon forces, but to experience the real thing one has to come home, particularly to New York.

Likes: Fresh eggs.

ANNE PARRISH

Dislikes: Guests in the country who give no hint of when they intend to end their visits.

Likes: Lilacs.

LORETTA YOUNG

Dislikes: The way they seal perfume bottles. You have to have a set of burglar's tools to open them, and then half of it spills.

Likes: Milk; I always have a bottle in my dressing room at the studio, and I drink it with all my meals.

SAMUEL HOPKINS ADAMS

Dislikes: Lemon pie and radio blurbs, because they nauseate me. I'd rather sit on a thistle than listen to after-dinner rhetoric.

Likes: I like life and wish I had more of it left.

ROBERT HILLYER

Dislikes: Leisure-class Communists.

Likes: Fried eggplant.

TEMPLE BAILEY

Dislikes: Oysters with cheese.

Likes: Patent-leather pumps.

ELLA RAINES

Dislikes: Persons who pout.

Likes: Visiting the zoo alone.

YOUR LIFE MAY DEPEND ON IT

ONE out of every nine persons who read this line will die of cancer. That is the present statistical truth on this cruelest of diseases to victims and loved ones alike: the disease which brought more deaths at home during the war than were met in combat, and which—unchecked—will eventually kill 15 million Americans now living.

For 2500 years, since the Greeks first diagnosed it, cancer has stalked the human race with pain and fear, surrounded by the stultifying taboos that regarded it as a "visitation from God," and made cure, or even alleviation, impossible. As late as the 1880's, most hospitals refused to accept cancer patients, and even recently obituaries have referred to it only as a "long illness."

Cancer itself is still a mystery. And treatment, in this Year Two of the Atomic Age, is still only a step ahead of the ancient Greeks, who cut or burned out the "anarchistic cells," using basically the same methods as those of modern surgery and X ray.

There has been progress in the past twenty-five years—more than in all the twenty-five centuries before—but it has been because of advances in other fields of medicine. Modern science has at last developed the instruments for definitive exploration into the nature of cancer, its causes and cure. The tools are on the table. There remains the need for an integrated effort such as that which cracked the atom, to crack the power of the second highest cause of death.

Memorial Cancer Center in New York City appears to be the potential focus for such an effort. Uniquely so, because today the already long-functioning Memorial Hospital and research center is the only cancer institution in the world to combine prevention, care and treatment of patients with research and teaching.

The tremendous implications of Memorial's program, in coordinating and extending expert knowledge and skill, have been recognized materially by a gift of $4,000,000 from the Alfred P. Sloan Foundation, a sum which the public is being asked to match in equal dollars. The plan of Memorial Cancer Fund provides for enlargement of the existing hospital (which has a constant waiting list of 300 patients), erection of the Sloan-Kettering Institute for Cancer Research, and erection, by the City of New York, of the James Ewing Hospital.

Memorial's waiting list is not confined to residents of New York; patients made hopeful by the center's high reputation come to it from all over the world; doctors who are victims of cancer almost invariably turn to Memorial as their best chance. The center's service to the whole nation makes support by the nation a matter of course.

The four million dollars asked of the public is minuscule in comparison with sums given to more publicized diseases—to say nothing of the millions spent for industrial research. In giving to the Memorial Cancer Center Fund, you may rightfully consider your contribution a kind of life-insurance premium. That is what it may mean to 15 million. No one knows whose names will be in the hat. None of us can afford not to help reduce that fatal number. Send your contribution to:

THE REVOLT AGAINST PAGANISM

By Harry Emerson Fosdick

BEFORE the war, the story runs, there was in Paris a Frenchman with strong anti-Semitic prejudices. Then the Nazis took over France and the Frenchman saw the ghastly things that anti-Semitism really means when it gets going. Recently on a street in Paris that Frenchman cordially greeted a Jew of his acquaintance. "Friend," he said, "these Nazis have taken everything away from me—even my anti-Semitism."

In eras of revolt against intolerable situations, humanity has made some of its most notable gains. Christianity spread across the Roman world with a speed that still seems incredible, not alone because Christ was what He was, but because the Roman world was what it was, facing moral degradation that to the best men and women of the time was becoming unendurable.

On that hard pagan world disgust

So, too, democracy was won, not so much because at first it seemed in itself desirable—many thoughtful men expected disaster from it—as because political tyranny grew to such monstrous oppressiveness that men, finding it unbearable, rebelled against it.

The most obvious illustration of such a reaction against an unbearable evil today is the public attitude toward war. We now read with shocked incredulity the praise of war, as in itself a major benediction, once commonly voiced by outstanding, respectable leaders—not only Field Marshal von Moltke saying, as might be expected, "The noblest virtues of man are developed in war. Without war the world would degenerate and disappear in a morass of materialism," but Ernest Renan, the Frenchman, saying, "War is one of the conditions of progress," and John Ruskin, the Englishman, saying, "War is the foundation of all the arts, of all the high virtues and faculties of men," and Theodore Roosevelt saying, "By war alone can we acquire those virile qualities necessary to win in the stern strife of actual life." No sane person now thinks any such thing about war. It has become intolerable, a suicidal process, with such inhuman horrors inherent in it as "should make the prevention of another great war," says Winston Churchill, "the main preoccupation of mankind."

Our present situation, fearful though it is, is full of hope. Mankind's major gains have been made in rebellion against evils grown insufferable. The urgent popular demand for a peace-making and peace-supporting organization of the nations springs now not from visionary idealism but from frightened realism, confronting in war a road that leads so straight to an earthly hell that not only all that is decent but all that is self-preservative in our instincts rises in revolt against it.

About the most terrifying aspect of Nazism was its scrapping of all distinction between right and wrong, its complete ethical indifferentism, making the self-interest of a so-called Master Race the sole criterion of conduct, as though there were no abiding moral laws and standards.

It was not a Nazi but an American, however, who wrote morality "is really nothing but a fashion, which changes from one year to another, from one country to another, from one place to another, and more especially from one person to another, as surely as the fashion and taste in hats and furniture."

The time has come for a revolt against that idea.

Everywhere else there are standards. In a scientific laboratory the standards are rigorous—honesty, accuracy, painstaking veracity about facts. In any realm of creative endeavor—Toscanini's work with an orchestra, for example—nothing is more impressive than the presence of high, imperative standards.

NOTHING can make Judas Iscariot or Hitler right. Nothing can make cruelty, hypocrisy, dishonesty, treachery or debauchery right. There are ethical standards!

To be sure, good character is like good health—each individual has his idiosyncrasies in handling it. Minor moral customs vary from time to time, from country to country, from individual to individual. It is unthinking to suppose that because minor moral customs change, basic moral laws are abrogated.

Dr. Henry Seidel Canby, of Yale, writing as a student of contemporary literature, sums up in a devastating paragraph this futilitarian attitude.

"The typical young person in some of the popular novels," he writes, "is often like this. At ten years of age, he sees through his parents, and begins to caricature them. At fourteen, he sees through education, and begins to dodge it. At eighteen, he sees through morality, and begins to step over it. At twenty, he loses all respect for his home town and for our government. At twenty-one, he comes of age and decides that our whole social system is perfectly ridiculous. At twenty-three, the story suddenly ends, because the young fellow has seen through everything and does not know what to do next."

At this point we have a justifiable complaint against certain types of teaching in our schools and colleges. The separation of church and state has made the positive presentation of our best spiritual and religious heritage very difficult and often impossible

ALL luscious ripe fruits contain dextrose . . . Nature puts it there.

To retain all the goodness of fresh fruits, leading canners follow nature's own recipe . . . they use dextrose sugar to capture the color, protect the delicate flavor and firm texture of fine fruits.

When you buy canned fruits, look for mention of dextrose on the label. It indicates superior color, finer flavor and texture . . . and, of course, an abundance of genuine food energy.

Heart TO Heart

TAKE one boy and one gal, add a casual introduction or two or three good chances to get acquainted, mix in a little light chatter and a few bright smiles, let matters stand for a week or two and what do you have? Well, that's up to you! A bow in the hair, a dash of perfume behind the ears may add to the hubba-hubba atmosphere, you can always depend on the moon to do its stuff, a few good records can provide mood music that's sweet and swoony, but the real work, the basic business of all boy-girl friendships, is up to you! So if you're the kind of wide-eyed young character who'd like to be loved (and who wouldn't!), why not try it this way:

YOU'LL CATCH HIS EYE. Ask any high-school joe what he sees first when he looks at a new gal and he'll tell you he just "sees her"—and from top to toe. It isn't her hair, it isn't her eyes, it isn't her smile—it's just her all over! So a really attractive gal will insure herself that groovy look, the stuff on which dreams are made, morning, noon and night—and even walking down the street to the corner drugstore! So start your campaign for heartbreaking (or heart taking!) by looking always as clean as a whistle and just as sharp. The average interesting high-school character likes to date a girl near his own age, so select your clothes, hair-do and even your dating outlook in the sweet-and-simple department. You're the kind of gal who looks wonderful out tobogganing on a Saturday afternoon in woolly ski pants and a big plaid lumber jacket. You look good with wind on your cheeks and snow on your hair. You're pretty as a picture when you come to school in a sweater and skirt, you look wonderful again at a basketball game in your pea-jacket coat and a little-boy cap on the back of your head. You manage that fragile "sweet and lovely" look in a formal with a full skirt, fluffy tulle and little bows. No trying to fool the fellows with the glamour of black satin, rhinestone earrings and mink tails in your hair! You're young and you're smart enough to try to look that way. Just be the kind of gal with the clean, fresh appeal of a bright red apple and you'll be the kind of gal a fellow will look at twice—and remember!

A DOUBLE TAKE. He sees you once, he sees you twice, he sees you once again, and it will be a long, long time before he gets that picture out of his memory if you have a personality to suit that pretty-as-a-picture look. All boys—even the crew-cut kind who get letter sweaters for football and know just how to dance to a Woody Herman recording—are sentimentalists. They like to think that all the best gals are made of sugar and spice and everything nice. So give them a little of that old sugar to keep them thinking of you.

Let them know that you have a good disposition. Not just on Friday nights when the man in your life is around, but Sunday, Monday and always. You don't sit and sulk just because you can't have another new sweater or because your dad says "No family car for you tonight"; you can get down on the floor yourself with a pair of scissors and a tube of paste when your little sister wants to play paper dolls; and even if your current hunk of heartbreak has to break a date at the last minute, you can come up smiling and be ready for a date next week instead! That's the kind of girl a fellow likes to think about in the hearts-and-flowers department! She's not only fun for a one-evening date, but—if a fellow wanted to get that serious—she's the kind of dream stuff that would be fun to be with all the time. A good sport, a good date and a good heart—all wrapped up into one really good gal!

AND HOW ABOUT FRIDAY NIGHT? Look the boy and the problem straight in the eye (all right, so you can't think when you have him on your mind!). Either he loves you or he loves you not—and you're the gal who can pick the daisies! He'll love you, if you love him—and that doesn't mean that you have to go dreamy-eyed and make with the sweet talk every time you see him. To "love" someone simply means to "like" someone, with a little hard work behind it. You like him enough to wear your very best new dress, all crisp and neat, on that special date with him. You like him enough to pin a blue bow in your hair simply because he remarked last week that you looked wonderful with a blue bow in your hair. You like him enough to listen hard (and even do a little outside reading about it) when he talks about jet propulsion, the atomic era or even Terry and the Pirates if that happens to interest him at the moment. You like him enough to enjoy a movie, bowling or an evening with the gang together—whatever happens to suit his whim and what's left of this week's allowance. You even like him well enough to work up the courage to tell him he looks wonderful with his new bow tie or in that red reindeer sweater!

THERE'S THAT MAN AGAIN! Of course he'll come back for more! Any smooth boy knows a good gal when he sees one—and when he dates one. A date is usually what the girl makes it. It's her mood, her co-operation in fun and her general date appeal that set the pace for the evening. It's up to you to start out for any bright-lights occasion, or even for a Saturday-afternoon Coke-and-a-walk date, with an "isn't this fun" attitude. When a boy asks you for a date, that's proof that he thinks you're smooth and fun to be with—then it's up to you to make sure you both have a good time to prove that he's smooth and fun to be with too! When a boy asks to hold your hand in the movie, it isn't only because he thinks you're something just this side of Joan Leslie—he wants to know, too, that you like him! And when a boy asks you to consider him as your steady fella or exchange class rings—he not only wants to show that he likes you, but he wants to know how you feel about him too! A smart gal can get the idea of friendship and honest interest across to her beau boys without being labeled an eager beaver. A fellow simply likes to know when he's liked or when he's loved or even when he's appreciated, and above all—he likes to know that you're his gal. You do have a heart—so why not use it?

Kills "Bottle Bacillus"

Listerine Antiseptic kills millions of the "bottle bacillus" germs . . . those ruthless little invaders that can grow in vast numbers on the scalp, threatening its health and the appearance of the hair. Many a noted dermatologist calls the "bottle bacillus" a causative agent of infectious dandruff.

Flakes Begin to Disappear

While Listerine Antiseptic mops up on germs, it also helps to rid scalp and hair of those distressing flakes and scales. And almost immediately itching is allayed.

Tend to Your Knitting!

Pelham Manor, New York.

Dear Editors: I greatly admire Al Parker's cover designs. However, in the December one, he made a slight mistake; the charming knitters are knitting upside down or wrong end to! They should be finishing the socks at the toe. If they were crocheting, this picture would be correct, but there are two needles as in knitting.

Very sincerely yours,
KATHERINE B. RETALLICK.

In every Parker drawing there is a distinctive Parker touch. The mother-daughter knitters, for instance, are adding a special Parker edge to already-knitted bootees. Take a bow, Mr. Parker! ED.

We'd Like to Know Too!

Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania.

Dear Editors: Al Parker's covers are absolutely the sweetest ideas being printed. Each one shows a modern Madonna in various moods. As to the latest (Dec.), I predict that mamma's blue bootee is more prophetic than Small Stuff's pink one. Who knows?!!

Semper Sinatra!

Albuquerque, New Mexico.

Dear Editors: I thought you'd like to know the letters (from Sinatra fans) are still coming—from Alaska, from a Japanese girl in Hawaii, two from Brazil, several from England, one from Scotland, and one from Jerusalem! I cut a stencil of the names of the 38 fan clubs I knew, and addresses, and had it mimeographed.

We've moved to Albuquerque for my health and the climate is swoonderful. No apartments—we had to buy a house trailer. But as long as I have a place to answer my Sinatra-mail (and I can still hear Frankie on the radio and my records) I'll stay happy.

Sinatraly yours and Forever Frank's,
DIANE DEE DEE STEVENS.

What Every Girl Should Know

New London, Connecticut.

Dear Editor: I teach Sex Education, or Social Hygiene, to the senior girls in the high school where I am school nurse. One of my textbooks is The Wonder of Life; I've found it to be a great aid and I was interested in your article, Explaining the Facts of Life.

Anyone who doesn't believe boys and girls should know these things is not living in this age.

Yours sincerely,
E. R. H.

Foolproof Cheese Soufflé

Columbia, South Carolina.

Dear Miss Batchelder: For many a long day I have intended to write to you, in appreciation for the magnificent work you are doing in keeping alive the "know how" of good food in this country.

Among my most cherished recipes was the one you published in the JOURNAL about 1942, for a foolproof cheese soufflé. I never had a failure with it, but rated a gold medal every time I served it, which was often. Of all the soufflés I ever tried this is the only one which stayed inflated, down to the last luscious spoonful.

MRS. M. R. D.

News of Iver and Lucille

Oxford, Georgia.

Dear Editors: I have four girls and they all agree with me that the JOURNAL stands first among the many periodicals to which we subscribe.

We'd love to hear more news of the little English children who stayed with you during part of the war.

MRS. HENRY JONES.

Iver, not much of a student in easy-going America, has buckled down in England, mastered Latin and was one of those in his class who moved ahead. He has now decided to become an engineer; but in the meantime is looking forward to rowing for his school. Sister Lucille, not as good a student, is, nevertheless, getting along very well. In England, boys are expected to do better than girls. Both talk "English" again instead of "American" but adore American sweets, toys, and hope to return someday. ED.

Praise for Mrs. Roosevelt

São Paulo, Brazil, South America.

Sirs: I, living here, didn't have any occasion to know important things about Mrs. Roosevelt until her column began to appear in the JOURNAL. From the beginning I was profoundly impressed, not only by her intelligence and great wisdom, but also by her dignity, kindness, objectiveness and common sense—a deep, human common sense which only great people have.

Very sincerely yours,
RITA DE ALBUQUERQUE LINS.

She Likes America

Dear Editors: I have been meaning to write and thank you for the delightful afternoon spent in your Editorial Workshop in New York City. I knew you all so well by name that meeting you and seeing, as it were, into the heart of the JOURNAL (its interiors, fashions and beautiful kitchens, really there and not just on paper) gave me the feeling of being a movie fan, miraculously transplanted to Hollywood, and introduced to all the stars!

Since then I have seen something more of the States and got to know a good many Americans. This seems as good a place to praise them as any. . . . Their hospitality and kindness are proverbial, and justly so.

I could go on, and on, writing about all the things I love over here: the architecture; the way children are treated, their self-confidence and real manners, the manners of the heart; they may greet you with a "Hi!" but they will bring up a chair for you to sit on; the good looks of American girls, particularly in New York; the amusement of grocery buying, helping oneself to everything and piling it into a little perambulator!

Just in case you think my case looks too good, I ought perhaps to say what I do not like. Well, your police and fire sirens, for one. Horrible, horrible noise! Maple sirup on sausage and mayonnaise sauce on fruit salad. (Our coffee is revolting and our eternal sprouts overboiled. But I said it first!) Lastly, my own discontent with any kitchen since I visited that of the JOURNAL.

During the years of war in England, I used to think of America with longing. Now, when I go back home, I shall again.

Sincerely,
MRS. J. O. HARMON.

Two Kinds of Women

Rogers, Arkansas.

Dear Editors: There are two kinds of women in every town: the kind that completes her education when she frames her high-school diploma—you know, "died at twenty, buried at sixty"; then there is her opposite, the woman who knows if you slump life will slap.

For these I would establish a School for Adults in every town of under four thousand. Educational advantages in small towns are now geared for those under twenty. Five hundred dollars would establish a school; if properly conducted, the school would be making money at the end of the second year.

I live in a small town. I know two hundred women that would be crowding the door the day such a school opened. The curriculum would include arts and crafts, French and Spanish (which can no longer be considered foreign languages), practical psychology, current events, writing and dramatics. One dollar a week would admit a woman to any, or all, classes. Four specially trained teachers, with a car, could easily handle schools in three towns, giving each town two days a week.

Won't Reduce!

Columbus, Indiana.

Dear Editors: The World War is supposed to be over. So—why not total peace? This would be a good time for beauty and style experts to quit making war on overweight women. Strange as it may seem, there are some women in this world who, though they strive to be attractive, have no wish to reduce.

Many of them are too busy, too sick, or both, to take the time and energy necessary to reduce. Others have husbands or sweethearts who actually prefer the heavier type of woman. Those same experts who do everything they can to make these women ashamed of their weight would do a great deal more good if they'd help these same overweight women become attractive to the eyes of others, take pride in their own appearance and gain in self-assurance because of it.

After all, some of us are tall, some short, some blondes, brunettes or redheads, so why is it necessary we should all be the same weight?

Sincerely yours,
FRANCES CLEVENGER ROSS.

Story of a Happy Man

Oxford, Michigan.

Dear Sirs: The story of my father, who lost his eyesight before he met my mother, may in a small way comfort some of our blinded veterans. His life contained love, business success and friends galore.

His first business venture was buying furs, and he couldn't be fooled on any kind of skin; he made money at this and then branched out into the produce business. Many a cold night he went alone to a loaded car on the track and kept fires going so the produce wouldn't freeze. He went everywhere alone, and he never forgot a voice, the shape and feeling of a hand, the sound of a footstep.

If ever a man had romance in his courtship, my dad did. My mother was a really beautiful young Irish girl, who came to help my grandmother with sewing. One day father, who was an expert swimmer, saved her life when she fell from a boat into the lake. (She never learned how to swim.) Soon after the near tragedy, they were married and certainly lived happily ever after. I never heard a cross word spoken in our home. It was a place of laughing and fun and my dad was the center of it all. I was ready for school before I realized he was blind. Our furniture was never changed and nothing was left around on the floor; mother served the plates in the kitchen with dad's meat, potatoes, vegetables always in the same place on the plate. But his affliction was never even mentioned. He had no special training, but he certainly overcame a great obstacle and no one pitied him. Over thirty years since his death, he is still remembered with love, respect and admiration; even with awe, as though he saw something that others couldn't ever see—and perhaps he did.

Sincerely yours,
LAVINA E. REGAN.

She Wants Her Journal

Washington, D. C.

Dear Editor: Your suggestion about passing on copies of the JOURNAL makes me feel thoroughly unpatriotic, because I do not. I am a dyed-in-the-wool collector and scrapbook maker. My regular collections are: Line a Day, Ask Any Woman, Watchbirds, and regular cartoons. I keep separate books and lend them to shut-ins.

I have a great assortment of house and room plans, and to my collection of poems, cute sayings, and so on, added 31 this month. I have a tremendous assortment of recipes, and love those with pictures attached. Last, but not least, the coupons, God bless them! This month I sent off eight. Now I ask you, would anybody else ever be able to enjoy my copy of the JOURNAL after I am finished with it?

My congratulations to the biggest 15 cents' worth in history.

Yours sincerely,
FRANCES V. JOHNSON.

Now that the paper situation is easing, we can and will print more JOURNALS, so more people can buy them. We must admit it's easy for us to forgive "hoarder" Johnson. ED.

Jap Women are Chattels

Buffalo, New York.

Dear Editors: The whole truth about Japanese customs concerning women has never been told. The Japanese have always been very touchy, and their embassy very vigilant, about any derogatory publicity. Formerly, if a returned missionary or member of the diplomatic corps should print facts shocking to western nations, he would be refused re-entry into Japan.

It is known that women in Japan are mere chattels, but the unmorality of the nation is not known: the renting of daughters to houses of prostitution for money to educate and advance the sons, and so on. There is a common saying in Japanese that "there are two things which can't be avoided by mankind—death and syphilis."

Sincerely,
ALICE BENNETT, M.D.

Civilian Snafu

The following letter to Mrs. Gould refers to her visit to the war fronts last year ("Our Readers Write Us," April, 1945). Mister Stecker was then Colonel, commanding officer of the famous 365th Fighter Group, the "Hell Hawks," headquarters in Belgium. ED.

Salem, Massachusetts.

Dear Beatrice: Do you remember our talk at the airfield in Belgium last spring, when you were so concerned with readjustment problems that would confront the returning soldiers? At that time, I thought you were much too worried about us. Of course we had lived, thought and fought war for so long that any future problem about civilized life did not impress us or divert our thoughts from the job at hand.

But since then we have won our wars, returned home and have been given the ruptured duck (discharge emblem—ED.) The last two months, the first civilian life in 4½ years, vividly reminded me of our conversation. I now understand what you were trying to say. The vet finds himself turned loose to lead a life beset with complications on housing and transportation, rusty and unused to the daily routine of his friends.

At this writing, I have just about returned to the way of life as it was 4½ years ago, knowing that the quickest way back is to fit oneself into the pattern of life as lived by the community. Most of the folks are eager and anxious to help the servicemen do that and we must realize that we cannot absorb the civilians but they must absorb us. And not an easy thing for both parties to do.

I hope that the next time we have a talk it will not be on some foreign airfield, ducking bombs of World War III. Let's try and skip that one, for I do not want to get readjusted again.

Best,
MR. RAY J. STECKER.

IN February, 1896, there was a Lorna Doone craze in Exmoor, England, with coaches and inns named after the famous heroine. The Journal's Complete-in-one-issue Novel

BY DOROTHY WALWORTH

ILLUSTRATED BY AL PARKER

THE moon set. The stars paled. Dawn rolled away the stone. Above Manhattan, the resurrected sun appeared to the rivers flowing beneath the silver bridges, the golden birds above the silver water, the ships clotted at the piers, the low dark houses, the high pale towers, the faint green clouds that were April in the parks.

Dawn was only an illusion of the people with egg-shaped faces who lived on this planet rolling perpetually beneath the light. Where the sun stood, it was always high noon. The earth and its people created day and night. And today, according to the heartbeats of the clocks these people had fashioned, would be the hours between light and dark which they called Easter.

Seven million people were rising again. It was Easter by the morning papers, by hot cross buns and plush rabbits and painted eggs in green paper grass at the breakfast tables, by pots of lilies and azaleas on Park Avenue, by pots of pink geraniums on South Bleecker Street. As the clocks ticked ten, Fifth Avenue blossomed with hats, imitations of life, of flowers and birds and fruits, with white and red and purple ribbons trembling in the mild wind.

The people with the egg-shaped faces would walk up and down aimlessly. Some of them would go to church; walk up and down again, without purpose, until it rained. That was the custom. For the celebration of the most unconventional event in the world's history, these people, wearing their imitations of life, were especially conventional.

The sun was not aware of them. He warmed their earth, brought their real flowers and fruit to harvest, set their real birds to singing in the dawn. But he was not aware.

This Easter of 1944 was different from all other Easters. The rivers were guarded; the ships at the piers were machines of war; in the low dark houses and the high pale towers there were those who mourned. And, in the year to come, there would be many more. Never had death been so close. Never had resurrection been so necessary.

The light moved westward. It was Easter now in Illinois . . . in Idaho. And everywhere the light moved came the voices of the people, millions of voices, interrupting the day.

St. Simon's Church was on the upper East Side. Built of gray stone, now blackened by soot, its small spire was dwarfed by apartment houses. Most of its members had forgotten the spire; the tiny cross was a pigeon perch. St. Simon's was fashionable and old, so old that its pews had doors which the ushers respectfully opened for their owners. This Easter morning the altar was banked with lilies. Behind the altar the famous Good Shepherd window showed, with ten thousand iridescent splinters, Christ in a simple seamless garment, holding a lamb.

By quarter to eleven, the pews were filled. The ushers had been careful that regular members should not be crowded out of their pews. Out in the vestibule, people were standing. "No room," the ushers said, passing with their gray gloves the church calendars printed in purple. At least these people could follow the service, hear the music and Doctor Tatum's sermon. It was expensive music, and Doctor Tatum preached beautiful sermons.

Christ the Lord is risen today, alleluia;
Sons of men and angels say, "alleluia."

That was the processional hymn. Down the aisle moved the freshly laundered choir. Behind them walked St. Simon's two assistant ministers, fat Mr. Mellon and young, awkward, freckled Mr. Primrose, faces decorous, singing bass. Last of all came Dr. Job Tatum himself, very tall, angular, his face, which looked as if it had been carved out of dark stubborn wood, topped by a thatch of bristling white hair. He was not singing, but staring over his hymnal at the altar. The procession passed up to the lilies. Underneath the singing and the rich pealing of the organ, there was a sighing from the people in the pews, a sighing that was lost in the hymn, unheard. And each heart, absorbed by its own sighing, would hear only now and then the words it had come to St. Simon's to hear.

The Lord is in His holy temple. Let all the earth keep silence before Him.

Gladys Foster had managed to get a seat in the last row of pews. This was the first church service she had ever been to, and from now on she was coming every Sunday. She had a new white hat, a navy-blue suit, white cotton gloves, and a bunch of violets Jake had sent her. He thought violets looked good with her dark red hair. It was so beautiful here. So different from her room at Mrs. Mitrou's boarding-house, and from the cage in the subway where she sat, five days a week, giving people nickels. And so different from where Jake was at the Army camp. People who believed in God must have a lot of money to make such a beautiful place.

Amen, amen.

She would never have come here if it hadn't been for what happened to Winnie. That had scared her. Winnie had the room next to hers and, for five years, Winnie and Gladys had been friends. Making cocoa and talking till all hours of the night. About deep things. Like love and why you do what you do. Winnie didn't go to church. But there couldn't be anybody better than Winnie, not if they went to church a million times.

Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name.

Of course, it had to be Winnie who got in the way of that taxi. Crossing the street, carrying a bunch of red carnations. At Bellevue they found Gladys Foster's name and address in her pocketbook, and, when Gladys came, a nurse gave her the red carnations, which hadn't been hurt at all. There was nowhere to take Winnie except a funeral home. It seemed dreadful to leave her in a place full of strangers, even though the funeral-home man pointed out that Winnie was now at peace.

Gladys wanted a minister to say something about Winnie at her funeral. So she went into a church near the funeral home; it looked very nice from the outside. And they asked what was Winnie's church affiliation, and she had to say that Winnie didn't have any. And they said they were sorry they were all so busy at this Easter season. Finally she got to see a young minister and he promised to come. She started to tell him about Winnie, but his secretary came in and said he was late for a meeting. At the funeral he read very fast out of a little black book and it was all over in five minutes. It just didn't seem possible anybody could get buried so fast, after almost thirty years of being alive and thinking people were so wonderful.

It scared Gladys. She didn't want to have it happen to her like it happened to Winnie. She was going to get affiliated, so she would have the right to have a minister at her funeral. Of course, she wasn't going to die. She was going to marry Jake and have three children. But just in case.

Yesterday she had happened to pass St. Simon's, and Reverend Primrose was in the vestibule and he took the trouble to show her all over. He showed her the Good Shepherd window, even the part of the inscription that was hidden by the choir stalls: FEED MY SHEEP. He said it meant that people should have a living wage and good housing conditions, and somehow she felt disappointed, but it was his being so kind that made her decide she was going to get affiliated with St. Simon's.

O day of rest and gladness. O day of joy and peace.

Good show, Nick Romney thought. These church people really knew how to package the stuff. If anybody had told him, a month ago, that he would be in church on Easter, he would have laughed in their faces. But last week Ben Bliss had offered him the role of the minister in Commuters to Heaven. It was a fat role, and the play was definitely going places.

Bliss didn't know—or did he?—what signing that contract meant to Nick. It had been two years since Nick's last success, and two years on Broadway are two centuries. Especially if you have just passed your fiftieth birthday.

He had pretended that all was well with Nick Romney. He had lied to everyone, knowing they didn't believe him and yet leaving a little tug of doubt in their minds so they didn't dare turn and destroy him, Broadway fashion. He no longer knew when he was lying and when he was not lying. Perhaps if, at one hour in the twenty-four, he could stop pretending, if he could go home to that too expensive apartment, which in itself was a pretense, and say to his wife Melita, "Comfort me, my darling . . ." But Melita, in her twenties, was not old enough to comfort him; she would never be old enough. But he thought he wanted her. Just as she was. Not like the scraggy or dumpy wives of other men of his age, but beautiful with silver eyes and a rich fleece of blue-black hair. With Melita he could pretend he was still young, when she would let him.

Three years ago, at the height of his success, it had been glamorous for her to be the envied young wife of Nick Romney. These last two years had worn the glamour thin, but when he showed her the contract with Bliss, she had curved her arms around him, her cool body warming to his success. And he had felt the old anguish of delight, which was false and not false, all in the same moment.

Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy mind and with all thy strength; this is the first commandment, and the second is like unto it: thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.

He had always taken a lot of pains with his roles. When he played the magician in The Wizard and His Wife, he had gone to a hundred sleight-of-hand shows, talked with magicians, watched how they moved, spoke, even how they thought. Now that he was cast as a minister, he would make it his business to get acquainted with ministers. Especially this Doctor Tatum, who was not only supposed to be a smash hit but was also near his own age and build. Preparation for this role would need extra care, because religion hadn't been his dish.

World without end. Amen.

The men who ran this church knew their stuff. Those Gothic arches. And the lights and the colors. And that processional they started with. What an opening for a play! The Broadway crowd ought to come over here and take lessons.

Death is swallowed up in victory.

He had one criticism. If these people really thought the Son of God had risen from the dead, they ought to let themselves go to town. There wasn't enough excitement. Even when everybody stood up to sing All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name. But it was a good tune; a swing band could take it out of this world. That Name really must have been powerful. It had lasted so long. And it probably still did something to people. But not to him.

Freely ye have received, freely give.

Laura had left at Easter breakfast the five men who tortured themselves with their intelligence. She did not say where she was going; they would have thought she was out of her mind and would have begun to dissect her as they dissected the world which they could take apart but never put together.

Every Sunday Henry invited guests for breakfast. It was necessary to his work, for he was a radio commentator with a program that purported to give the Inside Story Behind the News. Henry's guests wrote about the war for newspapers (Continued on Page 79)

He had to believe in God again. He had to believe in this age, which, despite its blood and blunders, had more life stirring in it than any other. He had to believe in Job Tatum, who had learned to hear, above the expensive, faultlessly trained choir of St. Simon's, the sigh of loneliness which came from the heart of mankind.

Suddenly, right there in St. Simon's she saw Jake, dressed in his battle uniform, helmet and all, with a sort of light about him.

She knew with rising panic that everything would be over between them if she continued to oppose him either silently or in words * * * *

Wed You Again

IF GEORGE HAD TAKEN UP WITH A NIGHT-CLUB DANCER, OR BOUGHT A FOX FARM—THAT AT LEAST WOULD BE LIKE MANY OTHER RESTLESS HUSBANDS ★ BY ANN CHIDESTER

IT began in a simple, quiet way, and then became an issue between them. He talked about this ranch he was going to buy and what he would name it—Poco Loco, he said, because it was a little crazy, the whole idea of a man who had always lived in the city, a man who wasn't exactly young, going down to Texas to start in the cattle business. He talked about it with enthusiasm so that she began to be afraid, and although she wanted to understand him she could not. And it had begun in such a small way—with the geraniums.

He brought them home one day in early March while it was still cold. He wore a heavy overcoat, and the streets were covered with snow, and the people huddled together in doorways and in subways, trying to get warm. And he thought of the geraniums. If it had been spring, she would not have been so surprised, but suddenly there he was with the slips in a paper bag, holding them with obvious delight.

"Got them this morning on the way to the factory," he said.

He had five pots for them. He planted them at once, carefully, in those unpainted, earthen pots. At first he suggested keeping them in the den, but when she explained that the dirt might sift over everything and that the pots were not very fancy, he agreed to keep them on the window sill in his dressing room. She wanted to laugh at him carrying the pots around so carefully, making a ritual of the planting of the flowers and then placing them in a beneficial spot.

"Geraniums are terribly unimaginative," she said. "If you're going to grow something, why not jonquils—something lovely and colorful?"

"Well, once when I was in college I used geraniums in a debate. I said something about the geranium pots of John Q. Public. Besides, there used to be a long bed of them outside the frat house, and every morning I'd walk past them on my way to the science building."

The next morning, sitting in her office, she thought about them. He's dissatisfied, she thought, wants to do something new. It would be different if he took up with night-club dancers or spent a lot of money on a fox farm, but with him it's something very simple—geraniums. She wanted to let it go at that, because now that she had labeled the trouble, solved the geraniums, nothing could come of it. She loved him and she had always loved him, but she was no longer very close to him.

The geraniums continued to bother her. She did not argue that since they showed no signs of progress they should be thrown out. Still, she began to feel that nothing was right in the apartment. It had begun to smell of that dry, warm earth, of those ugly, spriggly flowers that had not yet broken the surface. She then suggested that he ought to put them outside on the stone window ledge. "You could bring them in if there's danger of a frost."

"Should've thought of it myself," he said with enthusiasm. He got up at once from the dinner table and put the pots outside on the ledge. He seemed grateful for her interest in the flowers.

One day toward the end of that month, she came home earlier than usual. Without taking off her coat, she went into his dressing room and looked at the pots. He had wired an old tin Mexican tray to the ledge and set the unpainted pots on this. She raised the window and looked closely into each and saw nothing but the yellowish tips of the slips and the light imprints of his finger tips where he had smoothed over the dirt. She frowned.

I wonder, she thought, I wonder why he's doing this. What does he want? If I had been with him at Oran, would I understand this business with the geraniums?

That night, looking across the dinner table at him, she saw that he was not especially nice-looking, because of his nose having been broken that time in college when he did amateur boxing. Whenever he was tired, his upper lip seemed to get puffy. He had a slow, gentle smile. At thirty-four, he looked five or six years younger, and it was only when he looked at her a certain serious, longing way that he seemed older.

"George," she said, "have you been watching your plants?"

"Sure. Every day."

"What do you think?"

"Fine—just fine."

"But I looked tonight, and there's nothing there. I think they're dead."

"No. You can see new tips if you look close. You have to look close, that's all."

"Darling, really. Geraniums, of all things. You're no gardener."

FOR some reason this angered him. "Cathy, stop singing your little songs of doubt. These plants will do fine; you'll see."

"But, George, I didn't mean anything."

"I guess I'm jumpy." He smiled, looking at her carefully. "Tell me something, Cathy."

"What?"

"You're afraid, aren't you?"

"I don't know what you mean."

"I suppose not." He frowned. He ran his hand over his short reddish-brown hair. She wished he would let it grow out again. He clung to it as he clung to his Army friends. "It's just that all our adventures are over. I'm a paint manufacturer, and there's nothing new in that."

"But you're a good one, darling. Your father was the best in the business, and you're the best too. And you work hard."

"You always want me to feel good about that, and I suppose I ought to, but I don't any more. I want to go down to Texas and buy a ranch and go into the cattle business."

"Oh, George—you're not talking about that again?" She would make light of it so that he could forget about it.

He had been overseas for two years and four months. During that time, he had written cheerful, newsy letters twice a week. When he came home, he answered her questions and did not seem restless or desirous of any spectacular activities. He seldom looked into the sky when planes went overhead. But he began to talk about the ranch idea. Then he brought home geraniums, and she knew at once that these were part of the other, the ranch and the cattle.

That night she kept seeing a vision behind her closed eyes: the empty pots standing on the ledge, rattling in the wind, making little clicking sounds on the Mexican tray. She did not believe the geraniums would grow, and she thought that if he saw that he might stop talking about the ranch. It was not that she did not love him and desire his happiness—it was that he knew nothing about growing things, and his place was in the paint business.

AFTER the geraniums, it was this man, Bixby. That was in April. There were several cold days that month, and George took the geraniums off the ledge and put them inside the window. When he was dressing, she could hear him muttering as he bent over them. He would not allow the maid to water them or to move them. And then he brought this man Bixby home to dinner. He still called him "captain." She did not learn his first name, and so she called him captain too. He was a big red-haired man with a thick red beard which he said made him look like a British sailor. He had a soft, slow voice, and when he talked to her he looked directly at her so that she had to listen to everything he said, but he did not have much to say at first. He seemed to wait for George to begin. All through dinner she had the feeling he was waiting for George to open the subject of the ranch.

"How long are you staying, captain?" she asked.

"Can't say exactly, ma'am," he said.

George said, "He's clearing up some matters, Cathy. He thinks maybe he'll shove off the middle of next week."

Then she asked him where he lived and he took out his billfold and showed her a picture of his wife. She was young and raw, a thin girl in a wash dress standing before a long adobe house squinting into the sun. Her name was Eula. "It's really Eulalia, after her grandmaw, but we call her Eula."

"I see," she said. George was looking at her, smiling and waiting. "She looks lovely," she said. "Young and lovely." Good heavens, what did he expect her to say? (Continued on Page 208

Katie lay in the dark, remembering how Ben's voice had sounded when he said to her that "otherwise things would be too hard." All of a sudden she was frightened. What had he meant? Hard for whom?

is that Way

BY HOPE HALE

KATIE had lighted the candles before she served dessert. It was Bavarian cream, and they all took slow, deliberate mouthfuls, enjoying it delicately the way they should after such a meal as she had given them: smoked pork shoulder boiled with herbs in Katie's own way, potatoes and snap beans cooked in the broth, with spoon bread hot and tender and crusty right out of the oven. Not even Ben's mother, or her cook, Minnie, ever tried spoon bread.

Ben's mother was there tonight, and his father too. And Ben was showing off the baby, who sat in her high chair covered with smiles and liver soup.

Katie looked out at the hills beyond the bay window and sat back luxuriously after all her hopping up and running back and forth. She loved this time of year when the nights drew in, and candlelight enriched the sky to the excessive velvet blue of a Maxfield Parrish painting. It was the time of year when something besides the crispness and the clarity and the scent of burning leaves was in the air, something intangible and potent which one had only to breathe to become drunk with desire to start a project big and vague and glorious.

She remembered suddenly their plan, when Ben's parents had given them the house for a wedding present five years ago, to build a guest cottage up on the knoll with a great picture window looking out over the whole wide valley, and toward the foothills stepping up slowly in softening layers of blue to the Blue Ridge itself. Ben had even drawn a plan before he went away.

"Oh, Ben, remember ——"

He raised a warning hand. He was looking at the baby; they all were looking at the baby, waiting. But the baby just opened her blue eyes wide a moment at her father and then blew a large rude bubble.

"Ben, where do you suppose that blueprint ——"

"Sh-h-h." That was Ben's answer. He did not turn to look at her. His gray eyes were on the baby's face, concentrated and alight with eagerness. "Beth, what does the cow say?" he repeated, watching, waiting, rapt.

"Quack-quack," said Beth.

Ben and his parents laughed aloud, and the baby smacked her fat hands in self-applause.

"It's a joke, see?" Ben turned to his parents. "The very first attempt at humor; by incongruity, see?"

But Katie did not laugh. Katie had lifted a spoonful of Bavarian cream, but now she replaced it carefully in her dish. She stood up, looking down at the oblivious, laughing people in the candlelight, and then she left the room. Very quietly she walked to the stairway that angled up the living-room wall opposite the fireplace, and as she stepped on the stairs she looked at their clean light wood, undimmed by dust even in the tiny spaces between the spindles that supported the balustrade.

She walked to the bedroom and lay face down on her side of the four-poster bed. The ruffle of her light green pinafore fanned out crisp beneath her face, fragrant with cleanness and starch and ironing and with a subtle underscent of wind and sun. Tears came to her eyes. All their clothes, hers and the baby's and Ben's, were kept as sweetly immaculate. But no one noticed. No one cared.

She listened to the sounds downstairs. The laughing had stopped. The voices were low. Ben had realized, now, that she was gone. Of course he would, she thought, when it came time for Beth to be washed, undressed and put to bed.

She waited for Ben's footsteps on the stairs, and after a while they came; not running in remorse, but slowly, one at a time. He stood in the doorway; she could feel him looking down at her.

HE asked, after a moment, "What's the matter, Katie?" His voice was troubled. She did not answer, and lay waiting for him to come and try to take her in his arms. "Why did you leave us suddenly?" he went on, but he did not come over to the bed.

"My presence didn't seem very important to you," she said. "It seemed I was just a nuisance to you all ——" She broke off on a little sob.

"Katie, do you think that's true?" he asked her quietly.

Her brain dictated the instant, obvious answer: No! Of course not! I'm being perfectly absurd. But another part of her, not her brain, but somewhere deeper, more compelling, forced her lips to open and answer faintly, "It certainly did look that way."

He sighed. The sound sent anger scalding through her. She (Continued on Page 165)

A woman says, "You must come into the room of your mother unarmed."

BY DOROTHY THOMPSON

GENTLEMEN of the United Nations Security Council, I would like to present my credentials and crave a hearing.

I come from Mary Doe. She did not tell me to come, and yet she sent me. She said, "Someone must speak up." She has been saying that over and over again for centuries. So I have come to speak up. For I am, myself, Mary Doe. We are a very large family—the Doe family. Our name is translated into all languages; we live in every quarter of the earth.

Profession? Housekeeper, homemaker, wife, mother. You, gentlemen, have often called us the pillars and preservers of civilization. You have pinned golden stars upon our bosoms, and laid Purple Hearts in our hands. You have asked us to give our sons, our children, "to save the world." You have asked us to endure the crucifixion of our sons, that the sins of nations might be wiped out and all people everywhere live out their lives in freedom from want and fear.

We have given you our sons. Some are dead, and some are blind, and some gibber behind bars, and some walk without feet and work without hands, and each of these is as precious to one of us as all the world we gave them to you to save.

Only there is one pain that is beyond that pain. That is that they should also have been betrayed; that you should have been playing a joke on us—a great obscene joke—with the lives of our children.

Gentlemen, as we embraced our sons, sending them forth, we prayed—for them, and for you. We prayed that they might live, and that if they died it would be quick and merciful. We prayed for you, that you would be mindful of us and of them—mindful of the ghosts of them. We prayed, gentlemen, that for the sacrifice of our sons, you would break forever the terror that cometh by day and by night. We prayed that you would turn the bright ships of the air into doves of peace, and not flying dragons hurling death from their tails, as foretold in the Apocalypse. We prayed that you would break forever, and everywhere, the emplacements that hurl death swifter than sound and faster than light.

THAT prayer was silent, but it filled all the earth with its waves. They rose from the shelters of London and Coventry, Plymouth and Bristol. They wavered from the darkness under Cologne and Berlin, and in the rubble of Kiev they were heard and echoed, and in LeHavre and Chungking. And sometimes they were screamed aloud, with clenched fists, lifted against the sun and the departing death, over the blood of our children, our little children, spattered on the ground.

We did not distrust you in those days, gentlemen. We believed in you.

We said, "Soon there will be victory over the forces of evil, and then our good leaders will take the destruction out of the world, and the children of all future mothers will be tucked into bed with laughter, and the sons of all future mothers will guide the plow, or tend the assembly line, or write the books, or paint the pictures, or pilot ships across the water or through the air, and we will be able to look, then, into the eyes of the photograph, under the Purple Heart, and say softly, 'You died, beloved, that this good world might be.'"

Then, we could be reconciled.

Now comes the second heartbreak.

I speak quietly, gentlemen. But we are mothers who cannot look into our dead sons' eyes. When we look, we see an accusation in them more terrible than your bombs.

Their eyes say, "It is a lie that we died to free humanity of fear and found the world forever on peace. Already there is talk again of war. Already new fetters are being forged on men, whether in the name of 'progress' or 'order.' Already new armies are forming, of nations and within nations, and already there is a quarrel between those who speak or pretend to speak for their peoples, as to who shall have the most dreadful war weapon ever invented, and under what circumstances it can be released to glaze the earth it strikes, destroy all living things and evaporate men, women and children into air. Already spheres of influence, all highly armed, are marked out into which others may not penetrate."

Gentlemen, all spheres of influence are inhabited by people. There may be minerals or oil in the ground of those "spheres." But above the ground are people. And all these people, men, women and children, are bound together, each with the other, into families of fathers who support, mothers who protect, and children, upon whose growth in love, whose unfolding in confidence and good will, whose education to the beauties of the mind and the senses, and to the eternal moral laws of human behavior, depend all civilization and culture.

Gentlemen, all these families in all the nations and in all the regions and spheres, whether they be black or white or brown or yellow of skin, have identical needs, hopes and yearnings. All, without exception, seek food, clothing and shelter; the breadwinners of all seek employment to satisfy these needs; and over and above these things, they want the leisure to pursue happiness, each according to his own bent—in creative, independent work or art, in sport or play, in entertainment or contemplation. All, without exception, seek freedom for their own development, as persons and societies, free of pressures from other "powers," and free of terrorization from parties within. And all, without exception, pray for the security of peace.

THERE may be at times states, or ambitious leaders of states, who are not "peace-loving," but there are only peace-loving mothers, fathers and children. In the societies they create for themselves and around themselves, within, yet apart from, the States, Powers and Parties you gentlemen represent, they live in mutual trust. They exchange with one another their work and its products. They meet one another without fear. If they travel abroad, they do not fear to stop at strange inns, among foreign peoples, or entrust themselves, at home or abroad, to strangers, who transport them from here to there, with every opportunity to take their lives. To be sure, they are policed, for among all men and women are a few who will not keep the basic laws, not to kill or steal, perjure or forge. But how mild is that policing when it is confined to the prevention of the crimes only of persons, not of states!

Nowhere must the peace of societies be "enforced" by instruments of indiscriminate terror.

WISHFUL THINKING #### ABOUT THE ATOMIC BOMB

Don't talk about it. (That won't make it go away. It's not a ghost.)

The higher-ups will solve it. (Not without directives from you, the common citizens; higher-ups are busy and notoriously unable to see things whole; in each man's department details loom large—they too, too likely assume that someone else is solving the future.)

A defense will be found. (No conceivable defense can prevent an enemy from dropping or quietly preplanting one atom bomb. One is too many.)

They won't use it. (No? We did.)

But that was against Japs. (Oh.)

That was a demonstration. (It certainly was. Consider its efficacy demonstrated.)

We can stay ahead of any enemy. (If we have two hundred atom bombs and they have twenty, we're still licked.)

We're keeping the secret. (For a few minutes. Two years is the presumed minimum, ten years is a good guess on how long before someone will be confident enough to toss one. If we don't build up war too fast, twenty or even fifty years more of un-Atomic bombed world is barely conceivable.)

By the time it comes, we'll be adjusted to the idea. (How nice for you.)

We'll outlaw the bomb. (Meaning don't use it till you really want to.)

We'll have an international organization with power behind it. (What? And when? Not if you keep stalling.)

We've never lost a war. (Looking forward to the novelty?)

They won't use it for fear of retaliation. (Armament race? Build enough atom-bomb shooters so they can't knock 'em out and the fun can go on for a while? Perpetual state of war insures eventual explosion in defiance of all reason.)

If your number's up — (Try taking it down.)

We all have to die sometime. (We have to live too.)

You can't change human nature. (It's done every day, lazy.)

I've heard all this. (It hasn't sunk in.)

I'll be dead by then. (If not, can fix. And don't you care what happens to your grandchildren?)

I'll leave town right now. (And go where? And do what for a living? May run into a houseless shortage—competition for caves.)

Pursuit of knowledge must stop! Or—just as bad—you can't stop the Forces of Nature. (Listen! This isn't inscrutable Nature—it's scrutable Nature, the Mind of Man—which means you.)

ATOMIC AGE!

All you gentlemen represent states organized in the name of these families.

You, Leader of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, speak for a state that proclaimed less than a generation ago the world-wide solidarity of all people who work and the right of each to participate justly in the wealth created by all. That was a program that attracted the hopes and enthusiasms of millions. Yet you have not once raised your voice against the slaughter of the children of the vast majority—the workers—and the blasting of our common mother earth, if only it be called "enforcing peace." Nor have you abandoned the idea that total peace can be achieved only by class war.

You, Mr. President, represent a country that proclaims liberty under law, the equal rights of all men, and the state as the servant of the people. Yet what have you done to bring law to the world—the law without which there is no liberty? You have collaborated with programs establishing one law for the victor and another for the vanquished, one law for the powers and another for the powerless, one law for the haves and another for the have-nots.

You, Mr. Prime Minister, represent a people rich in tolerance, so peaceable amongst themselves that your police carry no weapons, so sensitive of justice that they, longer than any others, have coupled mercy with justice in the inscriptions in your courts. And the Britons who put you into office did so on a program, freely arrived at by the will of the majority, to own and administer the basic wealth of the nation for the welfare of all. Yet so fragile is your peace that you do not dare permanently to dissolve your air-raid wardens or shelters, and you, too, have raised but a weak and unconvincing voice for the controlled prohibition of the race-destroying weapons that have usurped the last free zone of the globe, the air—the air that all men, everywhere, breathe without taxation, and from which, now, they must plan to shut themselves in holes, underground.

Gentlemen, speak no more to the mothers—the mothers who are, or have been, or hope to be—about your peace and its "enforcement." Your peace seems almost more terrible to us than was the war. For beyond the war we saw the rainbow of peace, but beyond your peace we see the lightning flashes heralding the thunders of war. Speak to us, gentlemen, of law; speak to us of liberty; speak to us of justice; speak to us of equality of right, duty and opportunity for persons and nations; speak to us of humanity, speak to us of truth, and translate for us these great abstractions into practical things.

Speak to us of those things that are the preconditions of peace and its only guaranty, and report to us what you are doing to create them. Speak no more to us of your terrible enforcements, not of peace, but of national power. Speak to us no more of mighty armies, huge fleets, echelons of bombing planes, and atomic bombs.

Speak to us of charity, and mercy, for these are the sisters of peace. While you make your speeches and lay your plans little children and their mothers are dying in the millions because they have no bread. Their fathers are gone—dead or disappeared into prison camps from which no word comes. Mothers with infants try to still them on famished breasts and no milk comes. For in their bodies is no nourishment to produce it. These, gentlemen, are children of "allies" and "enemies." But we, who are mothers, know no enemy children.

Each of these children was born in the blood of a woman and in the only pain whose vast earthquake is shot through with stars of joy—the pain and glory of the deliverance of life. Each comes into the world gasping for the air of life—the air that you continue to fill with the threat of horror and death. Each in its cradle learns trust in life. It grasps the finger held out to it, leans trustfully on every shoulder that shelters it, returns every stranger's smile with a smile. Nurtured in confidence and love, no child of mankind knows fear.

Yet you, gentlemen, whose policies are the outcome and re-creator of fear, dare promise to free the world of fear by means of mighty armies of national states. And as the result of your policies, declared to the world with unexampled smugness, the war against the children goes on after every arm has been laid down by our enemies, and millions look forward to the only prospect of lasting peace—the peace of the grave.

Some of you are Christian gentlemen. Each of your mothers taught you the words of the Great Book. Each of your mothers had but one ambition for you—that you should grow up to be a good man. Each of them taught you to pray, not "Make me a leader of the world," but, "Make me a good boy." Do you think your mothers were silly? Sentimental? Ah, no, gentlemen, they were deeply wise. For goodness is the only source of beneficent power. It is the spring of all power that nourishes and creates; the enemy of all power that destroys.

Gentlemen, this is all I have to say now. But it is not the last word. We, gentlemen, are one half of the human race. We were put into this world to brood and nurture, train and protect humanity. That is a function given us by nature and by God. We form the greatest international in the world. We speak a common language from Chungking to Moscow, and from Berlin to New York. You try, gentlemen, to keep us apart. You, sir, will not let us freely communicate with our sisters in Leningrad and Kiev, in Budapest and Belgrade. You, Mr. President, will not let us reach out our hands to a child in Munich or Berlin. You, Mr. Prime Minister, seem to fear more for the British Empire than care for the people in its far-flung parts. But in spite of you we shall find each other.

Gentlemen, beware! I come from Mary Doe, not to beseech but to admonish and to warn. I come humbly, but without fear. For I am pushed forward by the hosts of the mothers, for whom you first groped in the dark, and without whom you wander now in the dark, a darkness shot through with nightmares and terrors.

We would relieve you of your fears, gentlemen. But first you must lay aside your guns. You cannot talk to the mothers with bombing planes and atomic bombs. You must come into the room of your mother unarmed. Then we will show you that the healing power in the world is not where you search for it, is not in the earthquake and the fire, but in the still small voice; is not in the instruments of destruction, but in the universal will to creation; is not in the intellect even, but in the emotion of the ideal—the unquenchable faith in life, the indestructible power of love

A SCIENTIST TELLS US WHAT WE MAY EXPECT

By J. C. Furnas

LOOK out the front window at your peaceful street—the usual city residential street with lampposts, bits of hedge, cars parked here and there, your neighbor's pup trotting aimlessly slantwise down the opposite sidewalk. Curious that what you are looking at, as well as the room you sit in, is now the most dangerous place in the world. You, your husband and your children would be much safer adrift in a small boat in mid-Pacific or caught in an epidemic of bubonic plague than here, warmly at home.

If your small son is given to asking solemn questions on subjects picked up from the radio, get ready for one about the atom bomb. To be honest with Junior, you must tell him how frantically perilous the misapplied ingenuity of the human race has made things for all of you; that, unless somebody does something shrewdly constructive, people will no longer select places to live in but places to die in; that the only really safe places in the whole world these days are two blasted, uninhabitable spots called Hiroshima and Nagasaki; that, if things go on this way, civilization will presently be wrecked just on the brink of the greatest opportunity ever to make it really fine.

Perhaps you had better not scare the wits out of the youngster that way. But, however excusable, it will be a ghastly lie to tell him anything else.

Even you, an adult, responsible citizen, probably find it difficult enough really to soak in what people who know most about the atom bomb consider to be its future meaning. Special pleaders for special interests have the whole matter thoroughly—and most dangerously—confused.

A MAN TELLS US WHAT WE MUST DO

By Struthers Burt

SAMUEL COLT, inventor, born at Hartford, Connecticut, 1814, and deceased there, 1862, celebrated his coming of age by "making all men equal." This was in 1835. That is, he made them equal in a certain lethal, final and uncomfortable fashion, provided they bought a Colt revolver and learned how to use it.

Mr. Colt, a child of twenty-one at the time, knew he had hold of something important, but even he could not have foreseen how much his invention would change the course of history, especially that of the frontier. Suddenly pounds became as nothing, and inches mere adornment. Faced by Mr. Colt's "cold steel," many a bulky bully was forced to put up or shut up, or, better still, decide before the event to tread softly and mind his manners. Diminutive but expert gentlemen came into their own, and delicate women found themselves possessed of the strength of ten.

So far so good, but, as is the case with most startling inventions, it remains a question as to whether, on the whole, Mr. Colt's ingenuity has benefited the world or harmed it. Mere equalization in itself is not an unmitigated blessing, and although the revolver, with its sinister descendants—the machine gun, the tommy gun, the automatic, and so on—has saved the lives and quiet of innumerable small men, it has also obliterated any number of inoffensive giants.

For every criminal who has "bit the dust" because of Mr. Colt, some officer of the law or some excellent citizen has done the same. Besides, so far as we know, the balance of nature may have been upset. Physiologically it has long been recognized that small men are more sensitive, violent and combative

SECRETARY TO MR. BLUEBEARD *

By Elsie Lee

WHEN Juliet Danton won Mr. Ferrier in the office secretarial pool, she shuddered, his fame having gone before him. Every little stenographer in Temporary Building X inserted a plea in her nightly prayers that the Almighty would prevent her seniority from coinciding with Mr. Ferrier's request for a new secretary.

After Julie had worked for her new boss for two weeks, she decided he was her share in the war effort. Not all wars were fought in foxholes, after all. A month later she encountered Anne McConnell, the head personnel manager, in the elevator one evening.

"How are things going?" Miss McConnell inquired anxiously.

"Well," said Julie dispassionately, "I often feel I cannot stand him another minute, but in the long run we all have a cross to bear. I guess Mr. Ferrier is my cross."

"Could you stand him another two months?" asked the personnel manager hopefully. "Because I expect a new crop of stenographers when the schools finish graduations."

"You mean," said Julie in astonishment, "I might be fired?"

"Oh, no," the manager reassured her. "No, indeed. Your work is most satisfactory, I'm sure, or Mr. Ferrier would have asked that you be transferred. He's had six secretaries, you know, and he requested that two of them be transferred. The others asked me for transfer themselves. I meant that if you could just stick it out until I have someone to put in your place, then I could transfer you to some nice quiet man."

"Really?" Julie commented with great interest. "So that's the way it works. I wondered what he did with his old secretaries. How long does a secretary last, on the average?"

"Well, you've stayed longer than most," Miss McConnell congratulated her. "Most of them asked for transfer after two weeks or a month, although it couldn't always be arranged immediately, of course. One girl did stay nearly three months before she asked for transfer, and as a matter of fact we had to allow her two weeks in a nursing home before she was ready to take on the new position. You've been here so long that I hoped perhaps he was beginning to settle down."

"Well, I'm not asking for transfer—yet," Julie replied. "Just what does he do to all the girls, Miss McConnell?"

"Oh, overtime, Sunday work, shouts at them," said the manager vaguely. "I don't know exactly, because most of them simply couldn't talk about it, but you're the seventh secretary in a year and a half."

"H'm-m-m," said Julie. "Well, you know what happened to Bluebeard when he took a seventh wife."

"No," replied Miss McConnell, seriously considering the question. "What happened?"

"She got all her brothers to come and cut his head off, that's what," Julie said ferociously.

"Oh, you needn't worry at all on that score," the woman assured her. "He's never annoyed any of his secretaries in that way. In fact," she concluded with a burst of perception, "I shouldn't wonder if that wasn't what discouraged one or two of them."

Julie was a Yankee, and no mere man was going to defeat her. Having made her mind up to this, she got a good deal of quiet amusement out of Mr. Ferrier. Undeniably he was infuriating to work for. He demanded reports and letters from her files and then lost them. Much later, of course, he would have a well-bred tantrum because she could not produce them. Julie got around this by placing a withdrawn sheet in the file showing the date and hour on which she had given Mr. Ferrier the report. If, later, he asked for it and it had not been returned to her, she was able to hoist him with his own petard. He expected her to work at a moment's notice until any hour of the night, and developed a habit of calling her up at home until she hit on the happy thought of giving her telephone to the next-door neighbors. He had not the faintest conception of time or how it flew, so she installed a large electric clock on the wall facing his desk. For every annoying habit he displayed, she found an antidote. She even got to enjoy circumventing him. Sometimes she had a faint suspicion that he was aware of this and deliberately thought up new bad habits in order to see what she would do, although this seemed implausible.

AT the same time, once Julie had negotiated the major hazards of her job, she began to appreciate her boss as a man. This has been the death of many a promising boss-secretary relationship, but Julie's private life was too healthily full of young officers and assorted friends and relatives passing through Washington for her to waste any energy on romantic notions. Mr. Ferrier gradually emerged in her mind as an exciting man to work for. Julie had a quick mind, and once she began to see what Mr. Ferrier's job comprised, she took a personal interest in the hectic variations of the days and their successful conclusions. Next she came to respect and admire him quite genuinely. The magnitude and value of the job he was accomplishing practically single-handed amazed her. She was definitely proud of being associated with him. The final stage of her subjection was the realization that Mr. Ferrier was certainly not more than thirty-five, and not bad-looking either: tall, lean, dark, with beetling black eyebrows; Julie got quite fond of him in a way.

The day that Mr. Ferrier returned unexpectedly from Dallas, the office was suffering from spring fever. With the big boss away, the secretarial mice played up and down the corridors and congregated at Julie's desk. To Julie, Mr. Ferrier's absence was always the signal for cleaning up all the loose ends she hadn't had time for when he was in town. So she sat at her desk busily sorting memoranda and notes.

"How do you stand him, Julie?" one of the secretaries asked her.

"Oh, he's not so bad," Julie returned lightly.

"My boy friend wouldn't stand for my working so much overtime," another girl observed, preening herself slightly.

"Well, if I die an old maid you can blame it on Thomas U. Ferrier," Julie stated philosophically. "At least there's one thing to be said for him: he's still got all his hair"—with a slight dig at the girl with a boy friend. Her boss was as bald as an egg and at least seventy-eight.

"Wonder what the U stands for?" mused the girls.

"Unholy?" suggested Julie, rapidly making piles out of the scattered papers. She scrutinized the scribbled initials on the corners of the sheets. "T. U. F.," she remarked. "H'm-m-m. Tough by name and tough by nature."

Mr. Ferrier's voice cut across the secretarial giggles. "Tea party, Miss Danton? You might pour me a cup, if you can spare it." Laden with brief case and topcoat, he passed noncommittally into his office.

THE secretaries melted away like ice cubes, leaving Julie to sit with flaming cheeks and wait for a summons. Five minutes, ten minutes passed and the buzzer had not sounded. Julie continued to sort her papers methodically while her busy brain veered from misery to temper. Suppose he had heard their conversation—her cheeks burned again—but was that any reason for such a sarcastic remark?

Why shouldn't I have a chat once in a while? she thought rebelliously. I was working hard every minute. If he didn't like it, he could have said so privately, like a gentleman. "Pour me a cup of tea, if you can spare it!" I just wish I had a cup of tea, and I'd pour it right over that nice gabardine suit.

In the full flower of her rage, a beautiful juicy idea came to her. Quietly she went down to the stenographic-department lounge. Sure enough, there was the afternoon tea ready for the fifteen-minute break. Chuckling to herself, Julie emptied out a file tray and filled pitchers with tea and hot water, added a cup and saucer to her improvised tray, sugar, a generous handful of assorted chocolate cookies.

For this I will be fired, she told herself gleefully; and well worth it.

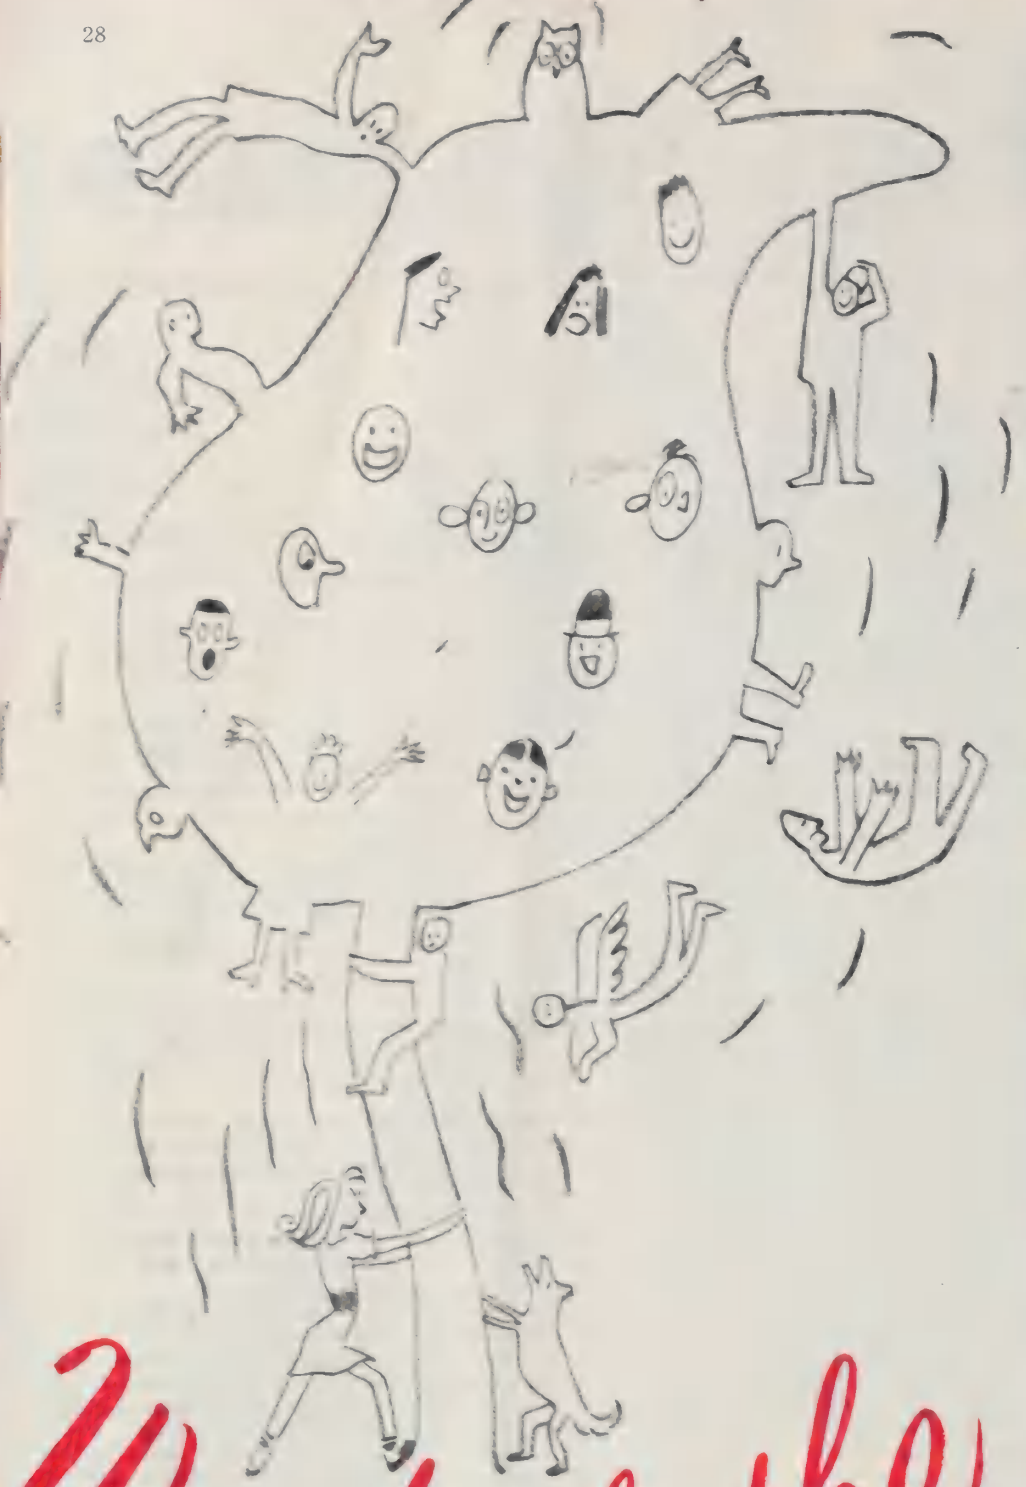
Casting everything to the winds, she opened the door of Mr. Ferrier's sanctum without knocking and swished over to his desk. He was already neck-deep in papers and looked up with a faint scowl.



"You wanted some tea?" she forestalled him mildly, waiting for the thunderbolt to fall.

But the insult misfired. Mr. Ferrier's scowl changed to a definite smile. "Where on earth did you get it?" he demanded gratefully. "You're a wonder, Miss Danton. I haven't had anything to eat since seven o'clock this morning." He pushed papers aside and took the tray from Julie's nerveless hands just as she was about to drop it from surprise.

"Seven o'clock this morning?" she echoed incredulously, the ministering angel in her coming out with a rush. "Why didn't you say so? I'll send down for a sandwich."

"No, no. This will tide me over. But you've brought only one cup." (Continued on Page 152

We shook the Family tree

IN THIS CLAN EVERYTHING IS STRICTLY RELATIVES . . . . AND THE MORE THE MERRIER ★ BY HILDEGARDE DOLSON

IT seems probable that I am one of the few blondes in New York who have two legitimate birthdays each year. This happened simply because I was born so close to midnight that nobody could decide on which side of the dividing line baby belonged. In the doctor's record that went to the courthouse, my birth was entered as August thirty-first; in the hospital record, it was September first.

The only times I ever found this double entry an advantage were the occasions in my teens when I had two beaus at one time, such occasions being about as rare as a total eclipse of the sun. But whenever this phenomenon occurred, I made the most of it. To the first of these feckless swains I would drop a casual, well-timed hint, something like, "Oh, look! There's a full moon tonight. I do hope that means it will be nice next Wednesday, August thirty-first." Even a rather slow-witted lad would naturally inquire as to the significance of that date. Then I would neigh like a shy, frightened mare, toss my head around, and eventually be forced into admitting that said date was my birthday. "But I didn't mean to tell you," I'd say, covered with pretty confusion. By following this same procedure with the second beau, merely substituting Thursday, September first, I was reasonably sure of two celebrations, complete with presents.

Now that I am past thirty-five, the charm of having two birthdays has paled considerably.

I am also a little weary of explaining to people that even though my name is Dutch and I was born in Pennsylvania, this doesn't make me Pennsylvania Dutch, by a long shot.

Franklin, Pennsylvania, where I grew up and where my parents still live, is in the beautiful hilly region, so rich in oil and old-line Republicans. My father was assistant cashier in a bank, and we owned our seven-room house, which looked like most other houses in Franklin or any other small town. Rather, it looked the same on the outside, but not inside. My mother was the kind of woman who could whip up an attractive slip cover out of an old kimona. For years our draperies were of unbleached muslin that cost probably ten cents a yard, but were enlivened with brilliant birds and flowers mother had painted on in oils. She also painted pictures that hung on all our walls. As a child, I liked the portraits because you could recognize the people, the landscapes because you could recognize the places. As an adult, I like them because they're good paintings.

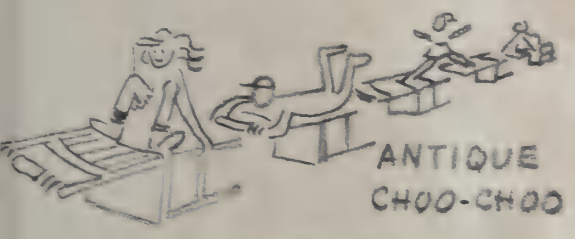
Most of our friends' homes had dark wallpaper, and the blinds were drawn to keep the sun from fading the carpet. Mother liked light and color, and small Oriental rugs ripened by sun and footsteps. Once when she bought two small new rugs, she became impatient waiting for them to age properly, and she put them outdoors every sunny day, to hurry the process. "Never economize on rugs or pianos, Hildegarde," she once told me solemnly.

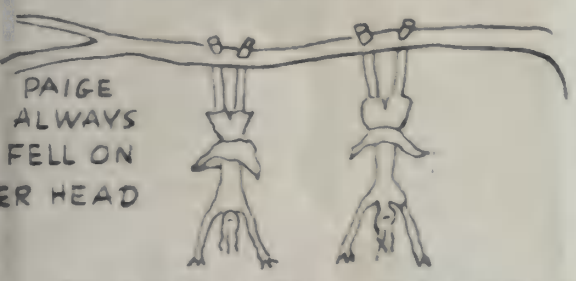
When an old lawyer in Franklin died and his office furnishings were being sold, mother said to my father, "Cliff, if you can get those office chairs of his at fifty cents apiece, I want them." My father thought mother was daft to want the homely old things, but she persisted, until all eight chairs were in our dining room.



Recently a man who is a decorator came to my apartment in New York with some friends. He saw two of the same chairs which mother had sent me years ago in a generous truckload of furniture from home. "Where did you get those?" he asked, in the tone one would normally use to inquire after the crown jewels.

Copyright, 1946, by Hildegarde Dolson. Condensed from the book shortly to be published by Random House.

I told him what I remembered of the original transaction, while he scrambled on the floor on his hands and knees, examining the chairs' bottoms.



"Hand doweled," he muttered, lying with his chin hooked on a chair rung. "Too marvelous." He offered to buy the chairs at forty dollars apiece, whenever I felt like selling. "Early Pennsylvania Dutch," he said. "Practically museum pieces."

Since then I've viewed the chairs with proper respect, as a nest egg in case of emergency.

As a child, I thought the chairs were useful mainly for piling together and playing train. With our little friend, Paige Campbell, who lived across the street, my brother Bobby and I would play choo-choo by the hour. When we wanted a train wreck, we'd crash all the chairs over in a fine, untidy mess, and I realize now that the Pennsylvania Dutch built good goods.

Paige was a pug-nosed little girl with straight bangs and one interesting failing: she had a passion for sneaking up to our bathroom and eating all the tooth paste out of the tube. She thought it tasted like peppermint candy. As mother said, it wasn't that we begrudged Paige the tooth paste, but goodness knows what it would do to the dear child. Whenever the dear child started up the stairs with that hungry glint in her eye we would hurriedly offer her bread and jelly, or some other distraction. Sometimes this worked, but not often. The curious thing was that Paige had no appetite whatsoever for the tooth paste in her own home. After mother discovered this, she promptly switched to that same brand. It was really terrible-tasting stuff that foamed up like soap in the mouth, and all of us could understand why Paige scorned it as a light snack between meals. But we went on using that soapy brand for years, long after Paige had outgrown her exotic taste.

Paige was at least partly responsible for gumming up one of our favorite pastimes: climbing the apple tree and hanging by our heels from a rather low limb. Paige never had much stamina for hanging upside down, and she persisted in falling on her head. About the third or fourth time she behaved in this weakling fashion, mother ruled that none of us should climb the tree. This ruling lasted several months, and we were glad when the grownups forgot all about it.

Bobby was already famous all over Franklin as the little Dolson boy who climbed things. One day Mrs. Rose, a neighbor, telephoned mother and said frantically, "Come at once. It's Bobby—on a pole." Mother went down the street at a rather leisurely pace, until she saw which pole Bobby had picked to climb. It was the highest one in town—the flagpole in front of the Fourteenth Street school.

Bobby had already shinnied up to the top. When he saw mother he crowed, "Watch me, mommy," and let go of the pole with both hands, hanging precariously by his legs, while the pole bent with his weight. Mother was really scared. She said afterward that she wanted to say something that would bring the child down without startling him, and I've always thought she succeeded nicely. "Bobby, you might spoil your new shoelaces," she said in a clear, calm voice. "So come down the pole carefully."

Another playmate I was devoted to was Browlie, a mythical being I had invented before Bobby was born. Browlie was good company, but he was even handier when it came to needing a scapegoat. When I broke the statue of Winged Victory that stood on the piano, or ate up all the lump sugar, it caused me no pangs of conscience to admit that Browlie had done these evil deeds. I have a not too clear recollection of one such occasion, when I sat on the floor of mother's clothes closet with the door shut—standard punishment for maximum crimes, in our household. As I wiped illicit crumbs of chocolate cake from my face I was crying out piteously, "But Browlie was so hungry, poor little Browlie."

By the time my sister Sally was born, I had outgrown my mythical playmate. It might be more accurate to say that I had given up Browlie simply because Bobby was now old enough to be a useful front man for my Machiavellian deeds.

On the morning of the day that Sally arrived, I came down with the mumps—or, rather, came out with them, both sides of my face resembling footballs. "Thank goodness Bobby's at your grandmother's," mother said, applying vinegar packs to the swelling. I sat on the couch in the playroom stroking my jaws with interest. They still didn't hurt much. In the middle of the morning, mother suddenly ran to the telephone, called my father, and urged him to come home at once and bring Doctor Brown. Obviously she was excited, and it flattered me to have my mumps responsible for so much activity. I was rather puzzled when she wrapped me up well and told me to run over next door, to stay with old Mrs. Martin. "I'll phone her and explain," she said.

"But don't you want me to see Doctor Brown?" I asked.

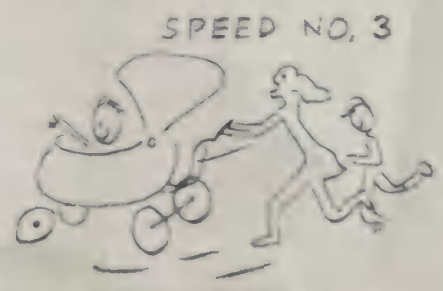
"No, dear. Just hurry, like a good little girl."

Old Mrs. Martin let me read to her—I was seven and already charmed with the printed page—and insisted I stay for lunch. I accepted in a daze of delight, thinking that mumps certainly brought on a gratifying amount of hospitality. By five o'clock that afternoon I was miserably homesick, with my mumps no longer an interesting novelty, but a painful, aching punishment every time I tried to swallow.

Finally my father came over to get me, looking very happy. "We have a surprise for you over at our house," he said. "Guess what it is."

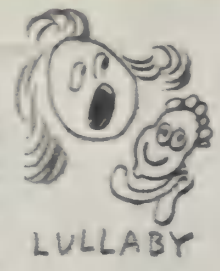
"A velocipede," I squealed.

"No, something even better." He explained that a stork had brought me a baby sister.



"Oh," I said, deflated. It seemed a pity that storks had no mechanical aptitude. Now my last hope was Santa Claus.

Father talked on about how nice it was to have a baby sister to play with, and as he talked my enthusiasm grew. There also grew in me the proud feeling that all this had happened solely because I had the mumps. For some time after that, mumps seemed to me the prime requisite for having a baby.

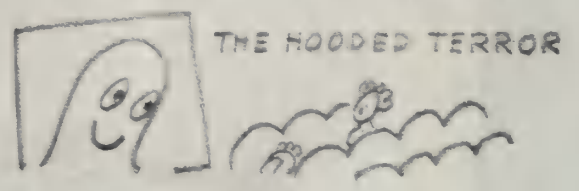


In the next three weeks, I was pretty mad at Sarah Cecilia, the new baby whom I'd never seen close to. Because of her, I had to live and sleep downstairs in the playroom, so as not to spread any mump germs. Twice a day the nurse would let me stand at the head of the stairs and call into mother's bedroom.

It was Thanksgiving Day when mother was finally allowed to come downstairs and have dinner with us. My father carried her down, and Bobby and I tumbled around like puppies, almost beside ourselves with joy. So far we didn't have much use for Sarah Cecilia, a scrawny thing with one scalp lock of red hair and incredible lung power.

Gradually we began to think our new sister wasn't too bad. When the baby was about eighteen months old,

Paige and I were allowed to wheel her down Buffalo Street every afternoon after school. It got to be quite a game, after we had worked out three speeds for pushing the carriage. Speed One was sedate, a slow crawl, and used exclusively if our mothers happened to be sitting on the front porch. Two was brisker, but Speed Three was really a honey. "Now Three," I would yell, and we'd charge downhill with the baby carriage at a breakneck speed, like runaway horses. My little sister seemed enchanted with this, and when Paige and I would stop at the foot of the hill, panting, she'd gurgle for more. However, for several years after this, she was an extremely nervous, high-strung child, and sometimes I think I know why. Due to her excitable temperament, it was an awful job to sing her to sleep at night. The more I sang our favorites—such as Round and Round the Mulberry Bush the Monkey Chased the Weasel—the wider awake she got. When my Cousin Priscilla, who was a year or so older than I, came from Meadville to visit us, she said I was using the wrong method on Sally.



"You have to sing the same thing over and over," she said, "until they get sick and tired of listening."

Thanks to Priscilla, I learned to sing Sweet and Low in a flat, dreary monotone for a half hour straight. This bored my young sister to tears, and she learned to welcome even sleep as an escape measure.

Besides teaching me how to drone babies to sleep, Priscilla introduced me to several new experiences. For one thing, she took me to my first Saturday serial, something she'd been following from week to week, called The Hooded Terror. If I had ever been to the movies before, I have no recollection of it. Sitting in the darkened theater with Priscilla, I enjoyed myself very much for the first few minutes, gaping at the life-size people on the screen, and reading the subtitles aloud in a slow, contented mutter. Suddenly a horrible monster appeared and seemed to be coming right at me—big and black and faceless. I clutched my cousin and let out a hoarse, strangled scream.

"Silly," she said, "that's just the Hooded Terror."

By that time I was already crouched down on the floor under my seat, moaning. Priscilla sat on the edge of her chair, ignoring me completely, and watched the Hooded Terror with intense interest.

Finally she said, "It's gone. You can come up now."

I crawled back on my seat, still shaken, and sat with my hands over my eyes, in case the Hooded Terror came back.

In the next few years I became very fond of the milder Saturday serials, with Pearl White being dropped into a den of snakes, and Billie Burke lost in pajamas in a jungle. Our favorite of all was Irene Castle, in a serial called Patria. Whenever I visited my cousins in Meadville, we all played Patria, with a bottle of red ink for blood. This was smeared all over my little Cousin Gretchen, who had to play the villain each time because she was too young to know better. Priscilla's older brother, Oliver, always insisted on being Irene Castle, to our wistful chagrin. He had an old reddish-brown wig which he'd don for this role, and a discarded salmon-colored satin evening dress of my aunt's. The total effect was really very chic. For one thing, the wig left the back of his head bare, and this was the first time we'd ever seen the short, shingled-back coiffure which became so popular a few years later.

Even if my Cousin Oliver wouldn't let me be Irene Castle, I still like to remember that once I was Snow White. Our Franklin grade school was putting on The Pageant of Snow White for the annual Parent-Teachers event, and I must have been chosen for the lead only because I possessed a high, penetrating voice. The auditorium had notably poor acoustics, and any leading lady who couldn't screech wasn't worth the powder to paint her face.

My parents were pleased at this honor bestowed upon their eldest offspring—aged eight. I behaved very daintily at rehearsals, and the costumes were wonderful. When the night came for the presentation, mother stayed with me in the dressing room until the last minute, combing my long yellow hair, and then went to sit proudly out front with my father and Bobby.

Everything went beautifully until after I had bitten into the poisoned apple which (Continued on Page 119)

LOVE WITHOUT LAUGHTER WAS, TO DINAH, LIKE SPRING WITHOUT FLOWERS. SHE DEMANDED BOTH.

By Gertrude Schweitzer

DINAH looked around the train car with shining eyes. Other eyes looked around the train car, too, but none of them shone except Dinah's. Why should they? It was hot in the car, and people and luggage were piled up so that they spilled out into the aisles. You could scarcely move without getting an elbow or the sharp edge of a suitcase in your ribs. You could scarcely breathe. Even the men in uniform, the men going home, had lost their shine somewhere around the outskirts of Miami and now looked only tired and hot and impatient.

But Dinah was different. No matter how bad things were, she knew they would get better—that everything would turn out all right. And for Dinah, everything almost always did.

She was that kind of girl. She was little and cute and electric, with red hair that would never stay in place and yet always looked exactly right, a small, pert-nosed face in which the blue eyes were so bright as to have the effect of a mild, pleasant shock, and an assortment of endearing mannerisms, such as shaking the hair out of her face with a small, quick movement, something like a wet puppy, and looking up at you suddenly with an almost boyish grin. Instantly, you see, you would want to make things right for Dinah if you possibly could.

And now, as a result, she was sitting on top of the world. Nothing so trivial as the discomforts of travel on a train overflowing with servicemen would possibly dampen her spirits. She was on her way to New York—to a job—to Craig!

A lieutenant across the aisle misunderstood her shining look and tried to disengage himself from a pile of luggage, hastily wiping his steaming face and pushing up the knot of his tie. She did not even see him. Her eyes were filled with visions: Times Square and the Empire State Building and Pennsylvania Station; a handsome gray-haired man with a small clipped mustache sitting behind a big polished-mahogany desk in an office overlooking Fifth Avenue, dictating letters to her; Craig, dancing with her on the St. Regis roof.

Craig, whom she hadn't seen for three years, and who at last was calling her "darling." He had been back from Europe for only a few months, but already he had a good job, a real future, and he was never coming back to Florida, and he hoped she would come to New York, darling.

New York? Maybe she was corny, but she had been dreaming of it ever since she'd known there was such a place. If Craig could get her a job and a room, she thought it would be the most wonderful thing in the world to join him there—darling.

And now she was actually on her way, because that's the way things happened for Dinah. The job was waiting for her to begin on Monday morning. The Empire State Building and Times Square and Penn Station were waiting. Craig was waiting. She had known him practically all her life—right through high school—and he was handsome in a shy, quiet sort of way, and they called each other "darling." Everything was wonderful.

She turned her bright glance away from the struggling lieutenant and moved it happily around the stuffy, crammed car until it was straight ahead of her, resting dreamily on the khaki shoulders of the man in front of her. She noted vaguely that the shoulders rose higher above the back of the seat than was customary, and that they were each equipped with a double silver bar. Diaper pins, she had heard the bars called. Or was that lieutenant's bars? Anyway, it was funny. Diaper pins. Suddenly it seemed so funny that she giggled out loud.

The head above the captain's bars jerked around as though she had dropped something hot on the neck. Gray eyes, deep-set in a lean, tanned face with jutting cheekbones, gave her a look of cold distaste. It was a brief look—almost immediately there was only a head and shoulders in front of her again—but it rankled. Men did not ordinarily look at Dinah with distaste.

She tried to forget it. She tried to see out the window, past the extensive frontage of the fat woman next to her, and think of New York and Craig. The idea of that soldier in diaper pins looking at her that way, spoiling the pleasant trend of her thoughts!

Finally she tapped him indignantly on the shoulder and he jerked around again, this time with some annoyance, with one irritable word, "Yes?"

She drew herself up with what she hoped was hauteur, not knowing that a lock of hair had fallen rakishly across one eyebrow. "Am I disturbing you?" she inquired coldly. "I mean—perhaps laughing isn't permitted in this car?"

She thought he was going to turn away without answering, but finally he muttered over his shoulder, "Sorry. I just don't happen to like women giggling down the back of my neck."

"I wasn't ——"

"Sorry," he broke in firmly, and again presented her with the rear of his head.

It was absurd to be so furious. What did she care for this strange soldier, when New York and Craig were waiting for her? But of course she did care. He was a young, attractive male, but it wasn't that. She'd have cared no matter who he was, looking at her with distaste and annoyance instead of with longing admiration. After all, she was a woman.

She leaned forward to speak to him again, to wither him, to—she didn't know what—when the fat lady in the next seat nudged her sharply, smiling and nodding and starting to rise.

"What is it?" Dinah inquired.

The woman shook her head, still smiling broadly, and shrugged her shoulders, all the while getting up and making inexplicable gestures with her hands. Dinah gathered finally that she wanted Dinah to have her seat near the window. It was useless to make any polite protest. The woman pushed her into place and struggled out into the aisle. A moment later she was standing near the captain in front of Dinah, smiling and gesticulating again, grasping him by the arms, nodding vigorously in Dinah's direction. In a few moments, since he was obviously paralyzed by amazement, she had succeeded in pulling him out of his seat and pushing him down beside Dinah. Then, with a loud, satisfied sigh, she sat down in his place and turned to beam at them.

"Yes-s-s," she said, with her violent nod. "Yes-s-s. Sit with friend."

Dinah did not dare to look at the captain. "I'm sorry," she said, her face to the window. "Apparently she thought we wanted to sit together. Maybe you can explain it to her. Maybe you can ——" She stopped, overcome, unable to go on, trying to bury her laughter in her handkerchief.

His voice shook. He was furious, she thought. "I doubt if I could ——" he began, and then he stopped, too, and his laugh, starting as a little, unwilling chuckle, grew to a roar, mingling with her bubbling giggle.

In the end, he had to give her his handkerchief to wipe her eyes, because her own absurd square of linen was so inadequate. "Here," he said gruffly. "For Christmas' sake!"

She glanced up at him out of one bright, brimming eye. "Are you going to get mean again?"

"Mean?" He stared down at her, without distaste now, but with no particular relish. "I'm not mean. I just don't like women. There's nothing personal in it, you understand."

"Oh." She smiled with knowing sympathy, no longer angry. "What happened? Did she fall for someone else while you were away?"

His forehead went into bewildered folds. "Did she —— Who? What are you talking about?"

Dinah said reasonably, "Usually, when a man doesn't like women it's because one woman turned out to be a ——"

"Oh, no, no, nothing like that." His voice would have been nice, Dinah reflected, if he hadn't kept filling it with annoyance and impatience. "I just don't like the species," he said, as though he were talking about flora and fauna or something. "Predatory, ruthless—give them a passably presentable man with money, throw in a uniform, and they'll stop at nothing to get him."

"So that's it. You think all the girls are after you."

He shrugged and put his head back and shut his eyes, indicating that the discussion was closed. Dinah glanced at him, and then looked out the window (Continued on Page 114

THE "OTHER WOMAN"

A Story Complete on This Page ♥ By Seymour Winslow

THERE must be, thought Janet, two distinct ways of falling in love. There was certainly such a thing as falling in love at first sight, since she had seen it happen to several girls. And then there was what you might call delayed-action love. It was like malaria: you didn't know you had it until it just curled you up.

The way she had fallen in love with Mr. Cooper was clearly delayed-action. Definitely it wasn't first sight, since she remembered very well her first sight of Mr. Cooper. It had been four years ago when she was ten years old and Mr. and Mrs. Cooper had moved into the house next door. She distinctly recalled thinking that he was nice-looking, but that was absolutely all—until a certain overwhelming moment just the other day.

Janet would never forget that moment. It was impossible to describe her sensations, although she had spent hours trying to find words for them. It came down to something like a combination of being knocked loopy by an unexpectedly big wave at the beach and the all-over feeling of utter happiness that arrives just as you finish your second straight cola.

She remembered vividly the moment in which love had come to her. She was in the lawn swing, shelling peas. Mr. Cooper, beyond the hedge, was trimming the grass with a sheep shears at the edges of his zinnia bed. Janet had glanced at him now and then, not feeling in love with him at all, but rather admiring the neatness with which he did things, when Mrs. Cooper, from somewhere inside the house, called, "Andy, where are you?" It wasn't so much calling as it was just plain yelling.

Mrs. Cooper was always yelling at her husband, and she always started her yelling from somewhere deep inside the house—instead of looking out a window to find out where he was and then speaking to him in an ordinary voice like a reasonable being.

To make his voice reach her, Mr. Cooper naturally had to yell back. He yelled, "Here I am. What do you want?"

From the depths, but closer to a window, Mrs. Cooper shrieked, "Where is here, for heaven's sake? Don't be such a dope."

"Out back," he shouted, keeping on with his work.

Janet was swept by a feeling of aching pity for Mr. Cooper, working away in the hot sun and being screeched at and called names by his wife, for whom he was always doing kind things like going on errands and brushing car seats before she got in. Janet wondered how he ever could have married such a woman.

Mrs. Cooper came to an upper back window. Mr. Cooper stood up, clicking his shears. "What's all the racket about?" he asked.

"Racket! Listen, clod, the racket is about those library books you forgot to take back."

"Oh, I just forgot them, I guess."

"You quarter-wit! Well, just take 'em back now. And get me some new ones."

"Can't you do it?" he called. "I don't know what new ones you want."

There was no answer. As Janet watched Mr. Cooper's imploring face raised to the deserted window, she wanted to rush to him, to take his hand, to comfort him, to tell him she loved him. Yes, that was the instant in which she knew she loved him. That feeling of the big wave and the two colas had come to her. Mr. Cooper tossed his shears to the grass in a gesture of lonely friendlessness that wrung Janet's heart. She almost ran into the kitchen.

Her mother said briskly, "Well! All done, Jan?"

Janet wondered that her mother couldn't see that she had been overtaken by one of the great shattering experiences of life. Surely her face must show that she was in love. It should even show that hers was a tragic love. That she was in love with a married man!

"Mother, I want to ask you something," she said. "Do you believe in divorce?"

"Well," her mother said, "I could wish there were a lot less of it. But I suppose it's justifiable sometimes, when two people get to hating each other, when their marriage is all washed up and they're leading a cat-and-dog life."

It occurred to Janet that this was exactly the kind of life that Mr. and Mrs. Cooper led. She called him names like "leather-puss" and "jug-ears." She yelled at him. Sometimes he yelled, too, of course, but only because she started it.

"You mean like Mr. and Mrs. Cooper, mother?"

"Of course not!" her mother said. "The Coopers are crazy about each other! What an idea!"

"But, mother, she yells at him so!"

"That doesn't necessarily mean anything. Janet, you're way beyond your depth. Andy and Bess Cooper are—well, sort of the shouting type. It's a form of heartiness. What you think of as noisy wrangling is—oh, call it affectionate roughhouse. But you wouldn't comprehend that. Now do hurry with those peas, Janet."

Janet hurried with them in dignified silence. The wonderful feeling of the big wave and the two colas was proof against misunderstanding and rebuff. And it came back, more wonderful than ever, that afternoon when, coming out of the Cooky Jar, her mouth full of macaroon, she almost crashed into Mr. Cooper, who was hurrying toward his car. Over his armful of packages he said "Hi, hello," and smiled at her. She had never seen him smile as brightly as that at his wife.

Janet swallowed and said "Hi," wishing she dared say "Hi, Mr. Cooper darling," since that was the way she felt.

"Want a lift home?" he said. He held the car door open for her.

Janet hadn't intended to go home for quite a while, but she got in. Mr. Cooper stowed his packages, climbed in and started off.

"Lucky we met," he said. "I wouldn't have been downtown this afternoon except for a couple of things Bess forgot to get."

Janet could imagine the scene that led up to his trip—bellowing and name-calling on Mrs. Cooper's side, patience, courtesy and unhappiness on his. She sent quick, admiring glances at his profile. It touched her to see how carefree he looked when he was out of reach of Mrs. Cooper's voice.

HE made a turn into easier traffic. "Well, how's school? Where are you now?"

"Second-year high," Janet was obliged to tell him. "It's all extremely juvenile—the studies, I mean." She laughed lightly at the absurdity of her being in high school.

"It wasn't for me," Mr. Cooper said. "All I could do to get through second year. But maybe that was because Bess joined the class that year."

So the savage Mrs. Cooper had been at high school with him. Undoubtedly, Janet thought, one of the basic troubles with their marriage was that they were almost the same age. Preparing for the agony his reply might bring her, she said, "Were you in love with her then?"

"Just bugs about her. Hard for me to believe now how completely dizzy I was."

It was plainly an admission of how his feelings had changed. Janet wanted to reach over and touch his hand to show him that she understood.

"DO you think that if a person marries somebody they fall in love with when they're in second-year high ——" So much depended on his answer that she couldn't finish the question. That didn't matter, though, because he guessed the rest of it. She could tell by the chivalrous way he pretended to misunderstand.

"I see. You've been falling in love yourself and you're wondering if it will last, the way it has with Bess and me. Well"—he turned into his driveway; Janet couldn't see his face, but she knew from the tight sound of his voice that he was choosing his words very carefully—"well, Bess is still my best girl and I'm still the guy that carries her books, but I'm afraid we're the exception and not the rule. Don't let our good luck make you feel too sure that this boy you think you're in love with now will be the guy you want to be married to, ten years from now." He got out and began collecting his packages.

Janet found voice enough to say, "Thanks for the lift."

If only there were some way to tell him that she recognized his magnificent loyalty to his wife, his knightly attempt to pretend that he still loved her. It was a noble thing to do, the noblest thing a man could do. Mr. Cooper was the finest man in the world. Janet loved him and would always love him. She would never marry anyone else. Perhaps on her deathbed she would dictate a will leaving the large fortune she would then have to Mr. Cooper's oldest grandchild. The boy—he would be a boy and the image of his grandfather—would never know why she had bequeathed him her estate. Her eyes filled with tears at the sweet sad thought.

But there was one thing she could do for Mr. Cooper now. Something almost as noble, in its way, as Mr. Cooper's splendid loyalty to the unworthy woman he had married. She could try to make his life a little happier by pleading with Mrs. Cooper to change her ways, if only a little, so that Mr. Cooper might be able, sometimes, to half believe that she still cared for him.

Mrs. Cooper was on the lawn, looking for four-leaf clovers. Janet, the lump in her throat almost choking her, walked over to her. "Hello, Jan," Mrs. Cooper said. "How's the girl?"

"Mrs. Cooper," Janet said, "I want to tell you something. It's about Mr. Cooper."

"What's that awful man been up to now? Waking you at dawn by tuning up that old car, I bet."

"Oh, no," Janet said. "It's nothing he's done. It's more about—well, the sort of person he is. About his—his sensitiveness."

From an upstairs window Mr. Cooper shouted, "Hey, Bess, what did you do with my old sweater? And don't tell me you gave it away or I'll lam you—but good!"

Mrs. Cooper yelled back, "It's in the hall closet, you lunk." She turned to Janet. "That man is something. What were you saying about his sensitivity? It must be a very recent development, but go on."

"Well, maybe I mean his romanticism. Sensitivity and romanticism both. I can't help but think—in fact, I'm sure—that he'd respond so quickly to—to affection."

Mrs. Cooper's eyes opened wide. "Merciful heaven," she said. "How can you be sure of such a thing, Janet?"

Janet hurried to say, "Only through observation and from knowing him very well, of course, and feeling very close to him, in a way. I mean from understanding his nature so well, knowing him to be such a fine person. Mrs. Cooper," she said in a rush, "I'm sure he cares for you, or at least he could care for you again—in spite of everything."

Mrs. Cooper stared blankly for a moment. Then she said, gently and seriously, "I hope you're right, Jan. Do you really think he is—disappointed in his marriage?"

"I'm afraid I have to say yes to that, Mrs. Cooper. But I don't think it's too late, even now."

"I hope not," Mrs. Cooper said soberly. She put an arm across Janet's shoulders and they paced the walk together. "What do you think I ought to do, Janet?"

Janet felt warm with gratefulness toward Mrs. Cooper for making her task less difficult. She said, "Well, Mr. Cooper is so hurt, so awfully wounded—you can see it in his face—when he's spoken to sharply and sometimes even shouted at. Oh, I know I'm being awfully fresh to say these things and you'll never forgive me, but ——"

"Go right on, Jan. I think you're sweet."

"Well, I know he feels it terribly when he's called names like 'dopey' and 'fog-head' and especially so loud that other people can hear. Mrs. Cooper, you still do love him a little, don't you? Even if not as much as when he used to carry your schoolbooks?"

"SOMEWHAT differently perhaps, Jan. It's not easy to explain. But I wouldn't hurt him for anything."

"He's one of the grandest men in the world," Janet said.

"And you're one of the nicest girls in the world," Mrs. Cooper said. She glanced toward the house. "I'm afraid I have to go in now. But I'm remembering everything you've said." She kissed Janet and went in, hurrying a little.

Janet went home. She sat in the swing, making it rock gently and trying to remember whether there had been a piece of pie left over from dinner. It was almost dark now. A light came on in the Cooper kitchen. Janet could see Mr. and Mrs. Cooper facing each other in the center of the room. Mrs. Cooper was telling him something that interested him and he was listening intently, his mouth slightly open. When Mrs. Cooper stopped talking they stood looking at each other for a moment and then they both laughed together in a way so fond and intimate that Janet could interpret it only as complete reconciliation. Then still laughing, they fell into each other's arms.

Janet looked away from the window. She felt the exaltation that comes only to those who, through love, and at a great personal sacrifice, bring a happier life to others. There had been a piece of pie left over, she remembered, and she hopped out of the swing to go and get it.

If You Ask Me

BY ELEANOR ROOSEVELT

Is it true that you employ seven secretaries?

No. I have Miss Thompson, who has been with me for over twenty years, and she has one assistant. I also have, on part time, one person and occasionally two, for research work.

Do you think it necessary to kneel when you pray?

I think it often is conducive to more concentration if you kneel when you pray, but I do not think it at all essential. Some of the most heartfelt prayers have been offered while men and women were doing some very active work.

A group of six women work in our office. We are wives, mothers and sweethearts of servicemen. We are appalled at rumors of war, inadequate foreign policy, the seemingly unprincipled induction and discharge of servicemen. We want to know what we can do about these things and how to avoid a third world war.

Your question is rather a large one. One of the things that you can do is to stop passing on the type of thing which creates rumors of war. You do not know whether the Administration's foreign policy is inadequate or not. We are passing through a period which is bound to be confusing and I think it would be only fair to wait a little while before making such a sweeping statement. I see absolutely no reason for saying that the induction and discharge of servicemen is "unprincipled." They are discharged according to rules laid down by the Army and Navy which are worked out with as great care as possible, and the men are inducted because they are needed in different parts of the world at the present time in the service of their country.

I think the best way to avoid a third world war is to work as hard as we know how for a strong United Nations Organization, with a security section that has some power and a good economic section that will try to solve economic and social questions which are confronting every nation in the world today.

Since American women spend so much of their time in business and politics, what can be done to keep them out of the taverns? Do you think if taverns were licensed to sell spiritous liquors only, and if tables and chairs for women and soft drinks and all food and music were banned in taverns, it would do any good?

I haven't the faintest idea. Women nearly always go where men go. In the long run, it seems to me, the important thing is to make whatever place people go to a decent place in which to be.

I am a girl fifteen years old. I have a problem that is really worrying me. I don't know whether my mother doesn't understand me or what, but I know she is disappointed in me. She used to be mad at me because I wanted to do the things my friends did. Now she doesn't like it because I don't. I can't talk things over with my mother like other girls can. I would really appreciate your advice.

It is very difficult for anyone to give personal advice such as you ask, but there is one general rule, and that is that it takes two people to talk things over, and that one of them usually has to make the first advance. Suppose you try asking your mother to talk with you. You might find that she is just waiting for an invitation.

Do you think the young people of today are worse than they were ten or twenty years ago?

Certainly not. I have lived more than sixty years and I have heard young people condemned many times. I think nearly every generation is better than the last, and I certainly admire the present one.

"What's your last name, baby?"

Would you please tell me if you believe, as I do, in love at first sight? Do you know of any actual cases?

No, I do not know of any actual cases, and I do not know whether I believe in love at first sight or not. I have seen love develop very quickly between two people and I have heard people say that they knew the minute they found themselves with the man or woman whom they later married, that there was immediately a great attraction, but I haven't the faintest idea if it was love at first sight or not.

Frankly, I do not find the filmy sheerness of nylons very flattering to mature legs, and I recall the silk service chiffon which really did help. My idea is to show real friendship to China by demanding silk hose. Let the younger women have their nylons, but I am sure many older women would prefer silk. What is your idea?

I really have given this very little thought. I never liked the feel of nylon as much as I like the feel of silk. If we could get silk for hose from China, it might be a good thing, but I do not know how the transportation situation is as yet, nor whether the silk-making industry there is able to provide us with the raw silk.

I wish to know if the quotation "We have nothing to fear but fear itself" is an original saying of the late President. If not, from whom did he quote?

It was an original saying, if there is anything really original!

As compared with men, what do you think are the chief faults of American women, both as workers in organizations, in public, and as individuals? Are there any respects in which as a group you think women are superior to men?

As workers in organizations I think sometimes women are more sensitive to supposed slights and get their feelings hurt more easily than men. When you say "in public," I suppose you mean in public office, and I should say this same trait is visible there. They find it hard to stand up under unfair criticism, and they are easily discouraged.

As individuals I think you have a more difficult question because every woman is different just as every man is different, and what you might say about one group even might not be true about another.

There is a large group of women, however, who lack self-confidence as individuals when they undertake anything outside of the traditional spheres in which women have always moved. Even as individuals the same sensitiveness to criticism is a drawback in family and social relationships. I think women are often superior to men in their intuition about people; in their executive ability when they are handling detailed work; and in their ability to subordinate themselves to a cause or to another individual if they think that is the way to serve a cause. You will laugh, ladies, but I think women often talk less and act more quickly than men.

How many more wars will there be to end war? I have lived through two, to one of which my husband gave his life. Don't you feel that it is ironic that two days after the United Nations became an international fact, the President should ask for national training to maintain our military supremacy?

I do not, and neither does anybody else, know how many more wars there will be, or whether we will have the intelligence to take the opportunity that lies before us and really build a peaceful world. It seems to me that we have only two alternatives, since we now have the power for the complete destruction of civilization in our hands. We must either have a peaceful world or run the risk of total destruction.

I do not think the President asked for national military training to sustain our military supremacy only. I think he felt the need at the present time to continue the training of our young men for military work. We none of us know just what kind of training will be needed for real defense in the future, and we will have to wait and review our whole defense problems, I think, before we make any final decisions.

Must another "lost generation" develop from our wartime laxity in morals?

No. I see no signs of a lost generation at present.

FASHION HAS AN EARLY SPRING

The first of spring brings in the pretty fashion of short, full sleeves, the flared skirt not seen for many seasons, and the saucy hat with the rolled-back brim—reminiscent of the "surrey with the fringe on the top." The wool dress with barrel fullness and push-up sleeves makes another, bolder change of silhouette, fills an important need for town. The shirred jersey and a surah suit will be loved for accessory possibilities—a flower at the belt, a scarf at the neckline. The newest casual suit has a longer loose jacket, worn even now with a printed cotton blouse. The early reefer is tapered to the waistline, round at the hips. Beige, gray and navy are predominating colors; lime-yellow, turquoise, tangerine-red, the bright shades that will blossom for spring.

EVEN had Amalie been physically able to stroll about the Hobson farm, the weather would have prevented such excursions. The first days of August were unseasonably chill and wet. From her windows she could see the soaking meadows, the cloudlike outlines of distant hills. For her the days were all the same. She was counting them, one by one. Today, she said to herself, Jerome has returned to Riversend. What is happening there? Tomorrow he will come. Or the next day at the most.

But the days passed. Amalie's trays stood untouched on the dresser. Mr. and Mrs. Hobson began to whisper together in the kitchen. They had not dared to question, even between themselves. But now indignation began to awaken in them. Something was wrong. Something had happened to Miz Lindsey. They knew she remained by the window, staring out of it for hours at a time. For whom was she waiting?

He will not come now, Amalie thought vaguely. If he had wanted to come, he would have been here days ago. He promised. He said he loved me. But he lied.

She saw a speck far down on the winding road. Yes, it was a buggy! "Jerome!" she cried, fluttering her hands at the window. Then she saw that the buggy was a strange one.

A short, elderly man was alighting. She recognized him—Mr. Eli Kendricks, one of Alfred's lawyers. He bustled toward the door, carrying a dispatch case. Presently Amalie heard his footsteps on the stairs.

He entered the room, cleared his throat as he laid down his dispatch case. He said, "Mrs. Lindsey, your husband has sent some papers for your signature. Just a formality. You'll read them, please, and then sign them."

She took the papers obediently and tried to read them. But only a phrase or two reached her consciousness: "—— refuses to divulge the name of her guilty partner . . . agrees not to contest the proposed divorce ——"

Mr. Kendricks said, "There's another little matter. Mr. Lindsey will give you one thousand dollars immediately after the divorce, on the condition that you will leave Riversend at once."

"Oh, yes, I'll go away," said Amalie. She signed the papers. "But I don't want Alfred's money. Please tell him that."

Her shoulders straightened, lifted. She had forgotten the lawyer. She was not seeing the road now, for she knew that Jerome would not come. She was alone again, as she had always been alone.

Mr. Kendricks returned the papers to his case. He searched for his hat, mumbled, "And now, good day to you, ma'am," and departed.

AMALIE did not stand by the window now. She went to her bed and lay down upon it. She did not know when night came. She did not know when it was morning. An enormous sickness had come over her. Through clouds of suffering she was occasionally conscious that Mrs. Hobson was ministering to her. She felt hands that lifted and moved her, cold wet cloths on her head. Between these periods of consciousness, she knew that she was so tired that she could not turn her head.

Once or twice she saw sunlight. Then she would sleep, and again the sunlight was there. Her eyelids were so heavy that she could hardly raise them.

After a long time she heard voices. Someone was in the room; someone was sitting beside her, holding her hand. She forced herself to turn her head. She opened her eyes.

Jerome was looking down at her. When he knew that she saw him, he dropped his head to her pillow, held her to him without speaking.

There was a long red wound on Jerome's forehead, and another, just beginning to heal, on his cheek. One of his eyes was swollen and bruised; his left arm was in a rigid contraption of wood and linen.

But there was much that he could not tell Amalie yet. He told her that Alfred had assaulted him, but dismissed the matter lightly, for he could not bear the horror and anguish in her eyes.

He told her that the divorce had been granted three days ago. There was so much that he could not tell her yet, but he did say, "The house is ours, if you wish it. Alfred and Philip have taken up temporary residence in the old Anstead house. With Dorothea. We can go home just as soon as we are married. And that will be when you are stronger. We'll have to be married in Pennsylvania. A matter of law."

Amalie listened, weeping. But she understood. The guilty party to a divorce could not be married in New York State within five years, except by special permission of the court.

"But your father," whispered Amalie, pushing back the pain that she must face when she was strong enough to remember that she and Jerome had driven Alfred and Philip and Dorothea from their home. "What of your father? He has not gone with—them?"

Jerome got up abruptly. He went to the window. "No," he said quietly. "My father did not go with them. He—stayed."

"Then he has forgiven us!"

"Yes, my dear, he—forgave—us. I—I have just learned about his—will. Alfred and I were to have the house together, or one to sell the other his share. We are to share the bank too. That is going to be a little hard. But somehow matters will adjust themselves. They always do."

Jerome turned quickly. Amalie was sitting up in bed, white as her sheets, her eyes staring fixedly at him. "Jerome," she murmured, "your father is dead."

THIS was what he had wished to spare her, and this was what he had stupidly betrayed. He sat down beside her, cursing himself. He searched his mind for lies, for comfort, but could say nothing. She turned away from him then, and buried her face in her pillows.

He began to plead with her. His words rushed out, but he dared not touch her. Now he must tell her everything. He must tell her that William Lindsey had unaccountably come down to the library and saved his son's life; that Mr. Lindsey had collapsed after a brief and feeble struggle with Alfred; that Alfred, forgetting the unconscious man at his feet, had carried his adopted father upstairs and summoned Dorothea and Doctor Hawley. Jerome himself had been left to lie in the library, forgotten except by Jim. Jim had ministered to him as well as possible, and when Doctor Hawley had come downstairs at midnight, Jim had called to him. The exhausted doctor had stitched Jerome's gashes and set his arm. Jerome himself had known nothing of what had occurred for days. Jim had nursed and fed him, changed the dressings on his face. The rest of the household was absorbed in the dying old man. It was on the fourth day that Jerome was remembered, and a servant sent to bring him to his father.

But Jerome could not tell Amalie of that scene by his father's bed. He could never tell anyone. He was silent now, remembering.

After a while, Jerome continued to speak in a dull and weary voice. He and Amalie must not feel themselves too guilty of Mr. Lindsey's death. He had sent Amalie his love before he died. He had urged Jerome to tell her that he had known for some time that he was dying and that nothing could save him. He was glad that his son and Amalie were to be married.

Amalie was crying again. She said, "We shall never be able to forget. That is our punishment!"

"I tell you, my darling, he had no reproaches for us."

Jerome sat beside her, kissing her gently, smoothing her hair, and she clung to him, weeping. He thought, How is it possible for me to take up life again here? What will happen to us? The whole township is full of hatred and vengefulness. He thought of leaving, of abandoning everything to Alfred.

And then he put Amalie aside and went to the window again. He looked out at the twilight which had succeeded the violent rain. He thought, I will not go away. There is work for me to do here. I will not be driven away.

Amalie Lindsey acknowledged that the landscape below Hilltop, while exuding an air of bustle and enterprise, had not been improved, esthetically speaking. Where, for instance, there had been a thickly wooded section of stream and trees, there was now a flourishing factory, owned and operated by King Munsey, who manufactured farm implements. Yes, the once lovely woods were now an eyesore. Amalie acknowledged that. But she also acknowledged that, due to Jerome's insistence, the broken shacks which had once stood near the edges of the woods were gone, (Continued on Page 54)

Her steady eyes and the proud indomitable lift of her chin made Jerome hate himself for the blow he had just given her.

TROUSSEAU IN A SUITCASE . . .

The bride who goes away in one suitcase is a smart girl who knows the world she lives in. Realistically she tells herself that travel today is characterized by speed, streamlining and a noticeable lack of porters . . . that half a dozen assorted bags may be awkward for her husband, and an obstacle to catching a train. Stubbornly, and quite rightly, she promises herself that she will not sacrifice a single shred that will add to the enchantment of a Southern honeymoon. . . .

There'll be moonlight and dancing. Evening dresses ought to be packed last, but are thought of first. A romantic print with a full skirt and a second one in linen with matching gloves and fan—at all costs she will reserve space for these.

The fact is: the two least packable items—her suit and coat—will travel smartly on her back. Mental notes: cool weather possible at destination . . . a good thing to have casual suit in beige or gray jersey whose blouse and skirt make a two-piece dress which looks right on a train or plane, or a palm-lined boulevard . . . a honeymoon coat which pairs off with slacks or an evening dress as well as suit . . . a finger-tip length casual style of rousing color will do it: red—surprisingly adaptable.

Who says a bride can't be practical? All the following fit like words and music into her suitcase, and into plans: A gay cotton or linen jacket and skirt that can be worn many ways. One cool sleeveless print or plain dress—picture a patio luncheon for two. Two gay young resort cottons—breakfast in the sun, browsing in the shops. A wool skirt and pair of slacks with two blouses and a sweater. A play suit with separate shorts, to be worn with different halters. Two bathing suits by all means. And a gay collection of scarfs, belts, jewelry. . . .

Will the shoes go in, or won't they? Ballet-type or flat cotton play shoes will. A pair of evening sandals must. Walking shoes will be worn with the travel suit. Golf and tennis shoes, if you insist, have all the earmarks of a problem. Let's not be too rigid . . . a smart overnight bag which the bride could carry herself will ease the tension and take the overflow. ★ ★ BY RUTH MARY PACKARD

SHE WAS VERY YOUNG: CHILD ENOUGH TO KNOW

WOMAN ENOUGH TO BE AFRAID THAT IT WOULDN'T.

Funny face

BY MONICA EWER

ROGER ANGER, theatrical agent, leaned across his desk and looked at her with professional indifference. Joan Hutton looked back at him with a friendly smile. He had been finding her jobs ever since the days she had first kicked up her heels in a child troupe. Not very good jobs, to be sure, but regular and enough for Joan's simple needs. Sometimes she dreamed a little wildly—those nights when she made the other girls laugh—dreamed that there might be a place for her to make a wider audience laugh. Meanwhile she went on year after year as an efficient and impersonal member of somebody's chorus.

"They've got to find a third," he said. "The woman's called Sandra Finert—she's one of my clients. She's a peaches-and-cream blonde—really lovely. Gets the men every time."

"They have a double act?"

"Yes. The man writes the music. I hear he's crazy about her."

"Tough luck on them having to take in a third."

Roger Anger nodded. "Mullins won't book them for the circuit otherwise. He's got one song-and-dance duo in the program already."

"I see."

He let his glance run over her small neat figure, up to her soft young face that had still an almost childish chubbiness, and ended his scrutiny at her mop of brown curls. "It has to be a brunette."

She smiled. She could almost read his thoughts. Perhaps when dad had first brought her to Mr. Anger, in the days when she was a plump schoolgirl, they had both hoped that someday she might turn into a raving beauty. Why not? Mum was lovely and could always get a job at Christmastime as the good fairy. And her eldest sister Milly was magnificent. She'd played any number of leading parts on tour. Only Joan—well, she stayed somehow just a kid, clear-eyed and rosy; just a kid, for all that she was eighteen.

"It's good money," said Mr. Anger.

"I'll try," she said, and added confidentially, "but I haven't much hope. Though it would make a grand first step." She gave a fleeting sigh. "But I haven't much hope."

"No?" He didn't seem surprised or worried. He'd get her one job or another and she would go on earning his commission. Neat little thing and knew her stuff. Came of a decent theatrical family. "Well, be at the Greek rehearsal rooms at eleven. And if there's nothing doing there, go on to the chorus audition at the Royal this afternoon at two. That's more your line. Here's the card."

"Thanks," she said and grinned cheerfully. "I'll come back and let you know."

As she reached the door he called to her with a bit of fatherly advice. "Try not to look as if you'd just come off the hockey field."

She laughed back at him. "I'm a comic," she said. "I've got a funny face." She screwed it up for his benefit. "Someday someone will let me be funny and then I'll bring us both home an old-age pension!"

It was really a waste of time going after this job with the peaches-and-cream blonde. But Joan hurried along Shaftesbury Avenue from a sense of duty. Her step was very quick and light, her ankles very trim. But as she caught sight of herself in passing in a shopwindow she made a little grimace. She looked healthy and happy and nice, but she lacked—what was it? That was it; she lacked—glamour. You'd never want to hang her in jewels or wrap her in yards of mink or pin a garden of orchids on her chest. She'd never inspire a great passion. She looked so unromantically healthy. She looked so absurdly young. Other girls at eighteen were poised women of the world. And she'd been earning her own living since she was fourteen and she still looked like a kid. It wasn't fair. She supposed it came of having a cheerful, equable temperament. It might be a help in getting one through the day's work, but it wasn't the kind of temperament that got one anywhere in the profession.

THE rehearsal rooms were in a side street off the Charing Cross Road. They were bare save for a few bentwood chairs and an upright piano. There were three people waiting: two girls and a young man at the piano. The peaches-and-cream blonde had not yet arrived.

When Joan saw the two other girls she knew at once that it was entirely useless to wait. Beautiful girls. One had smooth blue-black hair, a very white skin, and eyes of a size to suggest all kinds of smoldering passion. She was perhaps the lovelier of the two, though the other had more vitality and a mass of auburn hair piled high on the top of her head in a bewildering complexity of curls. The girls glanced once in her direction and then pretended that she did not exist and went on exchanging confidences in a low murmur.

Joan walked toward the piano and grinned at the young man. He was a thin young man, with a tired face and far-seeing gray eyes. She jerked her head in the direction of the two girls. "Shall I leave now or wait till I'm pushed?"

He looked up from his scrutiny of the keyboard and grinned back. He studied the small childlike face and the bright brown eyes. "You're very young."

"I'm eighteen."

"You don't look it. Where's your mother?"

"She's working with dad. They do a cross-talk act. My eldest brother is a mind reader. My youngest sister helps him. Milly is playing lead on the B tours of Kiss That Girl. Another brother is in revue. Of course we've got a black sheep in the family."

"No!"

"Yes, we have." She bent forward to whisper, "My third brother is a bank clerk. Don't tell, will you?"

"Cross my heart."

She smiled at him that frank, open smile that made her look so very young. "Nice to have met you. I can show myself out."

"Don't go."

"Why not?"

His eyes had not left her face. Now he spoke decisively. "Lots of reasons. For one—you're fun. For two—stay and you'll get this job."

"You're not making any mistake, are you?" she asked. "You know I want to be part of the act. Perhaps you thought that I'd just come here to scrub the floors."

"You'll get it," he repeated.

She looked round-eyed from him to the two other girls. "What makes you think so?"

"I'm psychic!"

"You're idiotic."

"Like to bet?"

"I won't take advantage of you."

"Well, get into your practice skirt."

She spoke as one exercising patience. "Have you looked at those other girls?"

"Yes. That's why I say you'll get the job."

"What's she like—this Sandra? Ever seen her?"

"She's beautiful." He ran his hands lightly over the keys and drew forth a small sweet melody. "I think she is the most beautiful woman I have ever seen."

Joan felt a pang of compassion for the poor pianist who must be so far removed from such a lovely lady. "I heard she was wonderful. It must be a great help ——" Her voice trailed away a little. It no longer seemed quite enough to look like a nice schoolgirl. It must be very comforting to make young men dream melodiously about one, to make them caress the keys at the mention of one's name, and write music inspired by the memory of one's beauty. Even though he was only a hired pianist at so much an hour. It must be very comforting—and anyway, he was a very nice pianist.

"WHAT are you thinking?" he asked.

"I've got to go," she said, the sudden color flooding her cheeks. She didn't want to stay and have the beautiful Sandra look at her coolly and reject her politely. It would be humiliating. Better to get away beforehand.

"Nonsense. The job is yours."

Joan gave him a rather uncertain smile. "You're nice and you're trying to be kind, but I know that next to those two ravishing creatures at the other end of the room, I look like the head girl at St. Angela's."

"I like the way you look," he said. "I like your funny face."

"Oh, you think it's funny," she said eagerly. "So do I."

"I think it's a lot of things—all pretty good."

"No—no," she said quickly. "I don't mind about that. I want to have a funny face—because I could be a funny person, if only anyone would ever let me. You can't think how difficult ——"

A door opened and closed. A clock somewhere chimed the quarter, and Sandra Finert swept into the rehearsal room and Joan saw at a glance that she was every bit as lovely as they had foretold. She had natural gold hair that curled on its own, gracefully, softly around her small head, and her eyes were a real violet blue, and her small features were models of regularity. It wasn't like a human face at all, thought Joan suddenly, but like something an artist might imagine, if he added all the perfections together. The result lacked a little in warmth and humanity. Sandra wore a lapin coat on which was pinned a bunch of fresh (Continued on Page 221)

With but a single thought

THIS piece deals in a big way with pure sentiment. If you have read thus far, and don't want any more, you may turn to the receipts and forget all about love, and just knock up some cakes and cook a nice supper. But if you are caught on the parlor sofa holding hands and playing footie, don't blame me. I didn't start this. I only make the whole thing more enticing, more worth while, more appropriate for the day, dedicated to good Saint Valentine. Such a lovely name, don't you think?

Hearts and flowers. I've always thought that this saint's day ought to have come in the summer. The glamour of hand-on-heart affairs would seem to require a moonlit garden. These cold and snowy days of February are like stone walls against any but young love, which skis, skates or builds snow men regardless of the weather.

It takes true love and undying affection to hang on to life's romantic moments. Let's not forget that. And when we pay tribute to the good old saint, let's do it in a spirit that is worthy of his name. Saint Valentine, a lovely name with a ring to it—lighthearted, frivolous, gay, wistful, sweet and sentimental.

For Saint Valentine's Day. The table should be bright and shining, and somewhere about there should be at least one red rose in a crystal vase, and the soft glow of candlelight. The food should be of the finest. And so we start off with a simple first course. Fruit of any kind, or a clear soup. Pink grapefruit with green grapes is our choice, for it somehow looks like a valentine itself.

Something very special. The main course should be as rich and satisfying as love itself. So we've selected something very special. It's not easy, but it's subtle and it's not what it seems to be. These are no chicken legs we are offering up to Saint Valentine.

CHICKEN KIEV

Cut the breasts, not forgetting the fillet underneath, from 3 chickens, before they are cooked. This is not so hard as it sounds, once you get the hang of it. Use a sharp knife, cut close to the breastbone, and ease the meat off. Hum Silver Threads Among the Gold and off they come. Easy does it. Steam what's left of the chickens and cook the giblets separately. Remove the leg bones from the chickens and clip off the joints. Shears are best. Now chop and mash the livers. For each liver, add 3 tablespoons of butter or margarine. Cream the liver and butter together well. Season highly with salt, pepper and

Pardon us, but your character

SOMEWHERE AMONG THESE GROUPS IS A PICTURE OF YOU.

PIGEONHOLING people is a popular parlor pastime—as is trying tongue-twisting statements like that one. Here is a test that will classify you and your friends according to the way you write. For the study of handwriting, or graphology, is a very good means of interpreting character.

Perhaps you are skeptical and think it can't be done. Are you game to try? It isn't necessary to believe in order to have fun. And maybe you'll be surprised. For Nock Sylvus, the greatest modern handwriting expert, has helped take handwriting out of the literary-curiosity class so that graphology is now a widely recognized science. It is being used for vocational purposes and in many clinics as a means of diagnosis for the understanding of human nature and the evaluating of personality.

You can try this alone or with a roomful of people. Each person must use pen and ink—his own pen if possible—and write down the following in a natural, unstudied manner. Or use something you have already written, being sure it was done in ink.

"Dear Aunt Babs: Here is a personality quiz—I know how you love them. George suggested I send it to you last week, but Pauline wanted to use it at a party first. Regards to you all, Lovingly,"

Then sign your name in the usual way—all of it.

With this before you, answer the questions in each of these eight groups. The one in which you have the most Yes answers is your handwriting type. Many persons are a combination type, with one type predominating, however. So if two, or even three, groups have four or more Yes answers, you are a combination of those two or three types.

A word of caution: Do not let the examples of handwriting types influence you unduly. Two handwritings which to the untrained eye seem very dissimilar may each have the essential points to put them in the same classification.

After you have checked the questions, find the reading under your handwriting type, or types. Then upon this background add the traits indicated by the questions and answers which follow the readings, and you will have your present personality picture as revealed by your handwriting.

Are you ready?

GROUP F

You are the FUNDAMENTAL type, materialistic and hearty and craving creature comforts. Neither sensitive nor nervous, you are the earthy people, the handworkers of the world. Aggressive and fearless, you make natural soldiers, sailors and men of fortune. Some musicians, singers and artists belong in this classification, those of the mechanical rather than creative type, also many farmers, painters, carpenters, machinists and engineers.

Men of this group are heavier than the women, but both are inclined to be stocky and loose-jointed, with short neck and full face and a tendency to overweight after middle age. And both make passionate, intense lovers, inclined to be jealous and possessive. This type should mate with someone who is also a Fundamental, at least in part, as you are not bothered with intangibles and have an eager, often sensual interest in fleshly gratification.

GROUP V

You in the VITAL group are interested in life and action. You are quick of step, vivacious and graceful, with sparkling eyes and good color. You make many friends and express your affections with ease and self-assurance; you love the out-of-doors and have a broad sense of humor.

Many composers are of this type, also exhibition dancers, publicity men, orators and actors and most of the salesmen. For this is the expansive, adaptive type, having practical common sense coupled with love of personal contact. You are long-lived, but apt to suffer from breakdown due to overwork and neglect of health. Marry in any group, except pure Fundamental. Parenthood is important, but wives are not lost to individuality after motherhood. They are good executives and detailists; the men great clubmen and sportsmen.

GROUP C

The CONSTRUCTIVE type is marked by love of construction. Cool and self-confident, you are prone to be taciturn and abrupt, but keen and witty. Hating monotony, routine and confinement, you love to wander and travel and are subject to accident and breakdown, but take punishment well. In build this type is prone to be loose-jointed, the skin dusky or pale, with good hair, teeth and eyes.

In this group are the architects and builders, sculptors and painters, explorers and cabinetmakers—those trades which combine skill of hand with accuracy of eye and a fine sense of proportion. However, this constructive sense does not always make you good home builders or mates. For you possessive by nature, yet want your personal freedom. The best mate would Constructive-Mental or a Vital-Fundame combination type.

GROUP N

This is the NERVOUS type, restless, ta tive, quick in mind and movement. Ge ally blue-eyed and fair, you incline to a larity of body and often seem awkward have personal magnetism. Appearing t frail, you have strong vitality and can vive more hardships than sturdier ty You have strong likes and dislikes, are in tive and high-strung, say what you th and are often religious.

Many actors are in this group, playwrig linguists, musicians, but not steady, trot workers. The women seem more ner than the men because they do not con themselves so well. Sensitive and comp all of you in this classification need outd life and quiet, and a pleasant life of c panionship in which sex does not play great a part. You should marry some who is in this group alone or in combinat with any of the others.

GROUP A

This is the ARTISTIC type and, contrary legend, is not more temperamental than others, for real artists are usually adaptat good-natured, friendly people. Less artist looking than the Vital, you are similar build to the Nervous: thin, angular, colori more pale than deep, with pretty hands a feet.

You are great on concentration, none t good at business, often fanatical in religi and do not have a strong love of family a home. You may have talent for the sta music, playwriting and all creative arts, only a deep appreciation for them. Y should marry someone who is also artist not a homebody. The men in this group less constant than the women, less shrew more creative. All are extremely sensitive color, beauty, perfume, and so on, and sensuous (not sensual).

GROUP I

This is the IDEAL type—the opposite earthy—and being delicately imaginati and aspiring, often but not necessarily spi itual. Very serious, with little humor, mo moral courage than physical, you in th group are not aggressive in forcing yo idealism on the world. So the fanatic do not belong here, unless linked with Fund mental, Constructive or Protective ty traits.

You are usually in-between in colorin neither striking blondes nor brunettes, an are often tall, frail and thin. You eat only t live, yet often outlive the hardier types there is a strong incentive. Unselfish and i tuitive, self-denial is easy for you, but yo are somewhat intolerant of a materialisti realistic world. Your mate should be a Ideal type. The really "called" clergymer the poets, philosophers and nonmaterialist of all kinds are in this group.

You might be surprised to find out how much you have changed if you would test some of your writing of five years ago, or even one year.

And a few years hence—who knows? But the changes will show up in your handwriting, of that you may be sure.

Any friendly evening plus dancing or bridge is sure to add up to appetite. For refueling, this cart supper of soup, curried chicken and water-cress sandwiches will win you top honors as a super chef.

BY RUTH MILLS TEAGUE

A LATE supper after a stimulating evening with your friends at a concert, a play or a good game of bridge is one of the delights of entertaining. It's a made-to-order formula for sure-fire success: informality, a receptive audience looking and feeling its special best, and a menu reduced almost to the proportions of a snack, but worthy to be discussed along with the arts. True, choosing the menu presents some tricky problems. It must be exquisite, obviously—this is no mediocre titbit we're planning for such an occasion—but the prepreparation of food must be so complete that within less than ten minutes after you reach home it can be served. And it must be light enough to induce purring contentment, not nightmares. Not such a large order, really. If design and organization are perfect, so will be your late supper, even if you've been away until the eleventh hour yourself. More of that later, but now to the menu.

For the chef-d'œuvre there will be Poulet Curry à la Crème. This is not curried chicken, but a luscious improvisation on the creamed-chicken theme, with just enough curry flavor to make it snap but not sizzle. It should be served from a chafing dish or hot bowl onto tiny—and I mean bite-size—triangles of crisp grilled bread, and there must be chutney, the essential accompaniment to any sort of curried dish. If Indian chutney is hard to find, there are domestic versions.

With the chicken we'll have steaming cups of clear chicken broth served at the same time (the combination is delicious), and rolled water-cress sandwiches.

After at least two servings of the Poulet Curry à la Crème, hunger will be gone, but we'll want coffee, and something to nibble while we drink it—not a real dessert. A beautiful tray of pecan-cheese balls and frosted grapes should be exactly right.

We'll plan for six or eight; and now for the recipes.

★ ★ POULET CURRY À LA CRÈME

Cut into pieces 2 big stewing chickens. I large kettle put 2½ quarts water, 1 onion, 2 ca several stalks of celery, leaves and all, 2 bay and 4 peppercorns. # LINE A DAY

By Ann Batchelder

1 Two things are at their best—apples (do you know Northern Spies?) and cheese. A perfect end to a perfect dinner. Apples icy cold, cheese warm as the inside of a fur mitten. That's for me.

2 A tiresome vegetable always left to itself is the green string bean. Oh, well, try fixing them up in a nice cream sauce with plenty of grated cheese and crumbs on top and bake au gratin. A dish to change your mind—maybe.

3 Essence of celery isn't celery soup in a fancy dress. Take four cups of strong chicken broth and heat in the double boiler. Add a slice or two of onion and a bunch of fresh celery tops. Let it cook. Strain. Season it well and serve very hot in cups. Put a spoonful of salted whipped cream on each cup.

4 What can be done with bread will never be completely told. There'll always be an untold story, and someday somebody will think that one up. You take large cubes of bread and fry them in butter or—well, you know what begins with m.

5 Second verse: Arrange the bread on a hot platter, cover with apricot purée—hot. Glaze with sweetened apricot juice, boiled to a thickness. Serve with chicken.

6 Spaghetti comes out of the kitchen into the haunts of haut monde. Rub your pan with garlic, melt a little butter or margarine in the pan. Add chopped chicken livers and mushrooms and a tin of Italian tomato paste. Stir in the cooked spaghetti and turn out on a hot platter. Sprinkle with grated Parmesan cheese. Run under the broiler and serve as is or with thin slices of ham.

7 From an old cookbook: "Put the soup in the kettle and let it boil fast and uncovered. It must be stirred constantly for eight hours." Let's see. That's from nine to five, isn't it?

8 If you feel that a baked potato is as prosaic as a bank statement, take out the mealy inside. Mash up with cream, salt and pepper and a touch of mace. Beat in some crisp bacon and sausages (the little ones). Stuff the shells. Dust with cheese and heat again. That'll learn you!

9 Grownups still like jams and preserves. Try this on them and you will see: Fold any preserve or jam into whipped cream and serve on gingerbread or cake squares.

10 News item: Now that the wars are over, back to town comes the smoked-trout pâté from a place called Colorado Springs. Heard of that, no doubt.

11 A very special salad dressing for a very special occasion. Grate a very little onion into a cup of mayonnaise, add a squeeze of onion juice, then fold in two tablespoons of caviar. Serve in the center hearts of lettuce with diced tomato and sliced hard-cooked egg.

12 Rarebits should have strings like forty harps. At least that's what I think. But the creamy, creamy kind suits most folks. Good ones come in jars. Just thin out and serve bubbling hot on toast, with pickles.

13 If you're going to have carrots, glaze them with sirup liberally endowed with chopped mint leaves. Use the smallest carrots. And, need I say it, cook them first.

14 Always longing, as you long for greener pastures, for some new little appetizer for a party? So are we all. Little squares of shad roe, sprinkled with lemon juice and rind, wrapped in bacon and fried, are sweethearts. Toothpicks again, remember.

15 Green bananas are not for baby, but for you they've got their points. Slice them (real green), dip in seasoned flour, fry in butter or margarine. Sprinkle with cinnamonized sugar and serve with chicken. ("Cinnamonized" is a new word.)

16 Two-part receipt, and worth it, is cauliflower with creamed lobster sauce. Don't faint, it's the truth. Delicious. Boil the cauliflower, drain it and keep it whole and hot. (Cover with a towel.)

17 Now make a highly seasoned, very-light cream sauce. Cut the lobster into thin slices and add to the sauce with the coral and tommi well beaten in for color and flavor. Pour over the cauliflower.

WINTER REVERIE

Oh, little river of my dreams,
Why call to me tonight?
For where I am the stars are bright
And cold the pale moon gleams.

What have you now to offer me
But winter's dreary charity?

18 Kitchen parties are going strong—or so I hear. Kitchenette parties may move out and go some other where. For eats make cheeseburgers, for a change. Toast English muffins, butter well. Clap on a thinnish hamburger, cover with rich, soft cheese. Broil. There!

19 Oyster pie, filled with creamed oysters, goes with the wind on a winter evening. A little mace in the sauce, and a crust as tender as a gossamer wing covers all. Serve with a salad and coffee.

20 Talking of oysters—winter's delight—be daring and make a scallop with cream of mushroom soup as a moistener. Dash of cayenne and a suspicion of mace.

21 Dept. of utter despair, farthest-south division: Tripe soup and milk soup "nice for children." But not for the kids I deal with.

22 A cream sauce for spaghetti is touched with the magic of sweet basil, and while slivers of ham may not be magic, they're top-drawer in this special affair.

23 If omelet-minded—and I hope you are—fold in a well-seasoned spinach purée for an uplift—both to omelet and spinach. Spinach asks for nutmeg. And then there's curried shrimps for your omelet! Well, what am I up to?

24 Parsnips rate with carrots in my cuisine, but if you will, you will. Or, what will be, will be. Fry them and sprinkle with chopped chives.

25 Cheese, crumpets, butter and soft Vermont maple sugar all go to make up the most delicious hot thing for tea you ever dreamed up. Divine is the word.

26 I'm accused of neglecting desserts. But to make up, take peach halves and drain. Put in a buttered casserole. Fill with macaroon crumbs, chopped nuts, and dot with butter or margarine. Bake and baste with cherry juice. Serve with whipped cream. That will hold you!

27 Baking-powder biscuits—can't she let 'em alone? Next time, my dears, but next time. Use orange juice instead of milk and grated peel—for fun—with dough. And next time you'll change your tune.

28 February has twenty-eight days, and it's up to the man of your heart this year. Follow directions and sleep well o' nights. Spring won't be long alingering now.

The Education of Eugene Miley

IT TOOK THE LESSONS OF WAR AND LOVE TO SEND AN EX-SERGEANT BACK TO SCHOOL * * *

By Bill Davidson

UP until several months ago, twenty-eight-year-old Eugene Miley was an unschooled, unpolished, common laborer from Lancaster County, Pennsylvania. The miracle of his education from that point on is a complex affair, involving, in the order of their appearance, a burst of machine-gun bullets, a girl, the G. I. Bill of Rights and a farsighted city public-school system.

The machine-gun bullets were German, 7 mm., and Miley caught them in the terrible battle of Cisterna, on the fringe of the Anzio beachhead in Italy. Miley, a staff sergeant then, was leading his squad in a futile attempt to break through to the American Rangers trapped in the town. On his second dash from ditch to ditch, the cross fire of the enemy got him. At first he thought he had just fallen. But then he looked down at his right leg. It was attached, below the knee, by only the flesh. Sixteen hours later, in an Army evacuation hospital, he lost the leg.

The girl's name is Frances Baker. She is tall and gray-eyed and serious, and she comes from Oxford, Georgia, near Atlanta. When Miley met her, she was a Wave stationed in the Navy Bureau of Personnel in Washington. He was in a bus, on his way home from Walter Reed Hospital, in Washington, when he looked up and saw her. She was going to visit friends in Lancaster, Pennsylvania. She was sitting right next to him in the bus. She was very pretty.

After a while, Miley spoke to her, timidly. She noticed his crutches and the Purple Heart on his chest, and she spoke to him. He saw her in Lancaster, and then in Washington. In Washington, he blurted out bitterly, "Why do you want to be messing around with a cripple? Don't you know I've only got one leg?"

Frances was a teacher and a graduate of the University of Georgia. "You fool," she said, crying, "I've never even looked at your legs. I've been too busy looking at your soul."

He kissed her.

One day in November, 1944, Miley put on his new blue civilian suit, got on a bus in Lititz, Pennsylvania, his home town, and went down to Philadelphia. He walked into the office of William E. Brunton, the Board of Education's Director of Veterans' Education. That's where the Veterans Administration had sent him for rehabilitation education under the G. I. Bill of Rights. The rain was pouring down and Miley stood there, dripping wet, a suitcase in either hand. "Sit down, son," Brunton said. Miley walked over and sat down. His new artificial leg didn't fit properly and he limped badly. He was just a few days out of the hospital. He was frightened and skeptical.

But then Brunton began speaking to him, and Miley wasn't frightened or skeptical any more. Tall, kindly Brunton, a World War I merchant-marine sailor, who had learned all the pitfalls of educating veterans by teaching them after the last war, explained the Philadelphia setup. He told Miley how, under the Veterans Administration, this school system is giving an accelerated high-school course to veterans from all over the country, and teaching trades in its vocational high schools to hundreds of other vets. He took Miley's papers, shook his hand and fixed him up temporarily with a room at the Y.M.C.A. Miley started classes the next day.

And so, at the age of twenty-eight, Eugene Miley entered high school with the fourteen-year-olds, resuming the education that had been interrupted in the eighth grade by hunger and depression more than a dozen years before.

Miley was born in the tiny village of Brunnerville, Pennsylvania, where his German-Scotch-Irish forebears had settled more than a century ago. As he says, "There is no mistaking my ancestry." He is tall and thin and deep-chested, with a pug-nosed face as Irish as Pat O'Brien's, and a crop of fine, straight hair as flaxen-blond as Siegfried's. He has gnarled workman's hands, quick blue farmer's eyes and slow farmer's speech. Brunnerville is in the fertile, picturesque Conestoga Valley country of the Pennsylvania Dutch and the Amish, Dunkard and Mennonite religious sects. "But," says Miley, "it wasn't very picturesque for the Mileys. All six of us crowded together into a little old broken-down tenant house."

Miley's father worked as a general laborer in the local animal-trap factory and eventually drifted off, leaving Mrs. Miley, Eugene and three younger daughters, Alverta, Violet and Bernice. Mrs. Miley tried to hold things together for a while. The tired, once beautiful woman, who lacked an education herself, tried mostly to keep the four children in school, especially young Gene, who was possessed of a tremendous curiosity and read everything he could get his hands on. "I read all the pulp magazines," he says, "and then I graduated to Collier's and The Saturday Evening Post. Mostly I picked them up in folks' trash cans. I even read the mail-order catalogues."

In the little two-room schoolhouse, Gene was well above the average in arithmetic, poor in everything else. He could stand at the blackboard working problems all day. But he had hours of chores to do, and he was a sickly child, so he missed more classes than he attended. Finally, in the blackest year of the depression, Gene walked up to the teacher in the tiny schoolhouse, turned in his books and said good-by. "I have to go to work to keep us from starving," he announced simply. He was just sixteen then, and he hadn't even completed the eighth grade. Alverta, Violet and Bernice, too, had to leave school to go to work before they finished the eighth grade.

Young Gene found a job as a laborer in a near-by shoe factory. Then he got a better-paying job with a small-house builder named Robert Yeager at $16 a week. This was outside work and it did him a lot of good. It filled out his skinny frame to a respectable 140 pounds. Also, it gave him a chance to work with Frank Sintz, a local artisan, who promised to teach him a real trade—bricklaying. In 1941, after six years in the construction business, Eugene was an apprentice bricklayer at $25 a week.

All this time, Miley retained his voracious appetite for reading, although he had trouble sometimes trying to figure out the big words. He was reading popular novels now. He struggled through Ellery Queen and one fourth of Gone With the Wind. He spent his precious nickels on the big national magazines every week and read them from contents to advertising. One day, back in 1940, he saw an advertisement for a correspondence school in one of the magazines. He sent for the catalogue and glowed vaguely when he read something about a course in accounting. He didn't quite know what accounting was. "I just recollected," he says, "that it had to do with bookkeeping and stuff." He always had liked mathematics. He sent for the course.

"That," said Miley, "got me hungry for learnin' again." Every night he hurried home from his hard day's work, stretched out in a chair and pored happily over the advanced mathematical equations. He didn't understand very much and got nowhere in the course, but he spent three hours a night looking through his books. He managed to work out six of the problems, and he did them over and over again, "I felt," he says, "like a composer practicing a new piece." But then came the collapse of the small-house industry in 1941. On December 12, 1942, Miley was inducted into the Army. The correspondence course was forgotten.

In the Army, Miley became a Ranger—the night-fighting, soundless-killing, knife-wielding American equivalent of the British Commando. He fought at Gela, Salerno, Venafro and Anzio. He knocked out an Italian tank overrunning the position and attacking toward the thinly held beach at Gela. He became a staff sergeant commanding his squad.

In the Anzio beachhead, the 1st, 3rd and 4th Ranger battalions were sent out one night to capture the important town of Cisterna, sitting astride the road to Rome. The 1st and the 3rd got into the town during the night, but by daylight they were surrounded by an entire German division. In the morning, the 4th Battalion, Miley's outfit, tried to attack into the town to allow the 1st and the 3rd to escape. The 4th didn't make a hundred yards. Of the 1400 men in the three Ranger battalions, the cream of the U. S. Army, there were only 200 survivors. Miley was cut down by the enemy machine guns in the first five minutes of the morning attack. He lay in an irrigation ditch for twelve hours before the medics could get to him. He put a tourniquet on his shattered right leg, but once, when he passed out, the tourniquet loosened itself and he lost pints of blood. Finally, after nightfall, the medics managed to crawl out and pulled him in. In the evacuation hospital, they pumped 100 cc. of whole blood and large quantities of plasma into him. That night they amputated the leg below the knee.

A few weeks later, Miley was lying around the Walter Reed Hospital in Washington. He was bored, and in a pretty bad (Continued on Page 190) replaced by cottages, surrounded by neat small gardens, wherein lived the workers at Munsey's factories.

The south end of Riversend now boasted a small but flourishing steel mill, a manufactory of harness and hardware, a big railroad shop, a wheat-flour mill, a brewery and a carriage factory. Extending far beyond these buildings lay the pleasant "garden" sections occupied by workers and their families. Each of the new owners of the factories had had his passionate but fruitless struggles with Jerome. Riversend, therefore, in appearance had become a "model manufacturing community."

There was not a spot upon the erstwhile tender landscape which did not steam or smoke, reflected Amalie, with a smile that combined both ruefulness and satisfaction. And this was all the doing of Jerome, her husband.

There had been a very bad time, during the panic of 1873. Jerome had almost bankrupted himself to keep the new horde of workers in food and under roofs. He had bought huge blocks of stock in youthful industries of Riversend, in order to keep them from going under. He had emerged, somewhat shaken, at the end of the panic, with a fortune quite depleted. Within five years, however, he was an enormously rich man. He was on the board of directors of every factory in the township. This wastrel, this loiterer on the fringes of a more sober and industrious society, had become the power of the community.

There are no faults in a thing we want badly.
He who gets a name for early rising may sleep all day.
The truth never choked a man.

But this community, though accepting him, drew the line at Amalie. He was fawned upon, respected, but she was not invited, save by her old friend, the Widow Kingsley, and the stout and bedecked wives of the "commercialists" who had invaded Riversend at the invitation of her husband. Neither Jerome nor Amalie resented this.

Amalie, standing slightly below Hilltop this hot and sultry August morning, could turn to her right and look at the western suburbs of Riversend. There, amid well-planted trees and excellent landscaping, stood the resplendent homes of the new industrialists. To her left, far down the hill, stood the severe but handsome residence of Alfred Lindsey. He had built this home eight years ago and there he lived with Dorothea as his housekeeper, and his son, Philip. He had not married Dorothea. He had married no one. Dorothea was more than adequate as cousin-mother to Philip, who had lately returned from Harvard, and it had never occurred to even the more censorious of the community that there might be anything even slightly questionable about Dorothea's presence in her cousin's home.

Though Alfred's house was less than three quarters of a mile from Hilltop, Amalie had seen none of that household close by, nor encountered any, for ten years. Once, on one of her rare excursions into Riversend, she had seen Philip at a distance. Then he had gone away to school. Amalie lived apart from Riversend, except for dining with the Widow Kingsley three or four times a year in Jerome's company, or entertaining, very occasionally, the wives of Jerome's industrial associates. When she and Jerome desired diversion, they went to New York or Boston or Philadelphia, and twice they had gone to Europe.

The "old" community was severely but graciously willing to accept her children. Invitations were extended to the very young Mary Maxwell Lindsey, but always a gracious reply from the young lady's mamma was returned: "We believe that Mary is not yet of an age when she should attend even children's parties." However, it was tacitly understood that when Mary was older she would be accepted in society, despite the ostracism of her mother. Mary would be quite an heiress, and she was her father's darling, despite the fact that he had a younger child, a son.

For some reason, Amalie was not resentful of the fact that Alfred had built within eye reach of Hilltop. She often sat on the terrace and looked down at the house with a strange, if tranquil, expression. Once Jerome had caught her like this and had said, disagreeably, "I shall buy you a pair of binoculars, so you can distinguish them more clearly." Amalie, her eyes twinkling, had accepted the offer, and when Jerome had actually given her the binoculars she had thanked him with more warmth than he liked. He never knew whether she used them or not, but had his suspicions that she did.

Amalie did. She would sit for a long time, the binoculars at her eyes, herself sheltered by the copse of pines. She could see Dorothea clearly in the garden, either strolling alone or with Alfred. When Philip was home on holidays, Amalie could see him sitting alone under bending willows, a book on his knee.

She and Jerome rarely, if ever, spoke of their alienated kinsmen. But sometimes, when they were alone together before the library fire, Amalie would see that Jerome had dropped his book and was staring before him with quiet savagery. Then the two ugly scars, one on his forehead and the other on his left cheek, would glow as scarlet as when they had been newly inflicted. Amalie knew that he hated Alfred and Dorothea with a voracious hatred, and that he felt his impotence to injure them. It did not matter to him that Alfred, with proud and touching dignity, had abandoned Hilltop to his cousin. Amalie knew that Jerome had offered to buy Alfred's interest in the house, and had been coldly refused. She knew, with secret and inner shrinking, that this grip Alfred was retaining on Hilltop maddened her husband, and she feared, not without a sense of justice, herself, that it was for this very reason that Alfred would not relinquish his share.

Amalie was thinking of many of these things this morning. She had filled a basket with the garden's best blooms for Mr. Lindsey's grave; this was the anniversary of his death.

She went into the house, encountered a maid and inquired for Mary. But Mary, as usual, had disappeared. Amalie uttered an impatient sound. She went into the library.

As she suspected, Mary was crouched in the depths of Mr. Lindsey's old leather chair, and was reading.

"Well," said Amalie, "you are a most odious young lady. I thought you were to help me gather the flowers for your grandfather's grave?"

Mary put aside the heavy book. She was less than ten years old, but she was tall for her age, and unchildishly shy. She said, "I'm sorry, mamma. I did not know it was so late."

"You never know. You are so very tiresome, Mary! I hoped to walk, but now we'll have to have the buggy. Look at your frock. In respect to your grandfather, you ought to have changed to something fresh."

The child looked down at her dress, but did not speak. She was somewhat afraid of her mother, who was usually impatient with her. But when Amalie stretched out her hand and smoothed the mass of hair on the childish shoulders, Mary detected more love than annoyance in the touch.

Amalie sighed. "Do go and find Jim, Mary, and ask him if he will drive us to the cemetery. And tie on a broad hat. The sun is very hot."

She put the basket on the long oaken table and left the room. When she was alone, the child approached the basket and delicately fondled the flowers. Roses, delphinium and early chrysanthemums made a splash of vivid color. Mary bent her head and sniffed deeply. Then she withdrew a single dark red bud and ran out of the room She climbed the staircase. She peeped into the bedroom of her mother and father. As she hoped, Amalie had gone for a last look at little William. Mary found a water glass, filled it from the pitcher, inserted the rose, and placed it on her father's dresser. She surveyed it with profound pleasure, then pulled the bud gently toward her and kissed it.

Her eyes, so like her grandfather's, sparkled deeply. She had a small face, pointed and delicate, but with a curious look of inner strength. It was not a mobile face, as Amalie's was. There was a hint of rigidity in it. Later it might be hard and cold as William Lindsey's had been on occasion. Now it was sweet and pure. A light of swift intelligence touched the eyes, the curves of the small pink mouth, the nostrils of the thin straight nose. Jerome called her his "little beauty," with pride and egotism. Quite without personal vanity, she knew that she was indeed beautiful, but she was glad of it, for it pleased her father.

She shook back her hair from her hot cheeks. As mamma had said, her frock of blue-and-red gingham was rumpled. She smoothed it with her small hands, pulled out the ruffles of her pinafore. Then, with Amalie's own impatience, she untied the pinafore, and threw it carelessly upon her father's favorite chair. He was to find it, later, and hide it hastily from Amalie's censorious eye. It touched and delighted him when he found these small evidences of his daughter's secret visits to his room. Mary ran down the stairs again, and hurried to find Jim.

In the meantime, Amalie had gone to the nursery. Little William, five years old, lay sleeping in his crib. She bent over him, her heart melting. If Mary was her father's darling, here lay her own. The little boy was big and sturdy, still retaining the roundness of babyhood. He slept lustily, his thick black curls spilling over the white pillows, one rosy fist clenched under his scarlet cheek.

AMALIE moved softly away from the nursery door. She was filled with a sense of profound satisfaction. She stopped in her room to tie on a wide straw hat, surveying herself dispassionately, but not without pleasure. She was thirty-three now, and childbearing had not injured her full, if slender, figure. Rather it had given her a richness, a fruitfulness. Her white lawn dress, enhanced her natural handsomeness. Her eyes shone vividly; her dark and glimmering hair was neat under her hat. It disturbed her, however, to remember that she had a few white hairs near one temple. But then, Jerome, at forty-two, was completely gray, and this only added to his distinction. As she thought of her husband her whole face melted, became young, almost breathless. Even the occasional angry turbulence which occurred between them only added to their passion for each other. There might be peace and contentment here, indeed, but there were furious upheavals also. Amalie laughed a little, and went downstairs.

She stood in the lower hall, after she had retrieved her basket of flowers from the library. The buggy was waiting. Jim, more gnarled than ever, was chattering loudly with Mary. He had brought out the two-seated open surrey, and Mary sat beside him, in front, bareheaded.

"You forgot your hat, you tiresome child," said Amalie, as Jim jumped out stiffly to assist her. "Go in at once and get it. You will have a sunstroke, and your father will blame me. Your cheeks are already flushed."

THE Lindsey burial plot lay at the far end of the cemetery, near an ivy-covered stone wall. A semicircle of tall frail willows drooped to the green earth, guarding the graves and sheltering the white marble benches. Here stood urns full of ferns and geraniums and bright phlox.

Amalie went to Mr. Lindsey's grave, accompanied by her daughter. Amalie laid the flowers gently on the grave. But someone else had been before her. There was a sheaf of white summer lilies there.

"What pretty flowers," said Mary. "What a shame to let them die here, where nobody can see them."

Amalie secretly approved of this realism, but she said, "Don't be silly, Mary. We see them, don't we? The flowers are for the living to enjoy, not the dead."

"Then why put them there?" asked the girl. "Why can't we take them home? We haven't any lilies like these."

Amalie was about to embark on a reproving lecture and then did not speak. Jerome was right. It was foolish to be sentimental with children. They always saw through it, and laughed at you in their hearts. She said, "Well, if you want one or two of the lilies, take them."

Mary eagerly selected two of the blossoms and held them adoringly in her small arms. "Grandpa won't mind, will he, mother?" she said.

"No," replied Amalie seriously, "I don't think he will. I think he'd like you to have them."

Mary gave her a quick, strange look, as though surprised at these words.

Amalie went on gently: "I wish you could have known your grandfather, Mary. He was more than a good man. He was a friend."

"Oh, yes," said the child, smelling the lilies. "I know."

"Papa told you?"

Mary shook her head. "No, I just know. I feel him, here."

Amalie knelt to rearrange the flowers. She said, "I wonder who brought the lilies."

"I suppose he did," said Mary calmly, pointing toward a bench in the shade of the willows.

Startled, Amalie turned. A man sat on the bench. When he saw that Amalie had discovered him, he rose and came forward.

"Philip!" exclaimed Amalie.

Smiling, he held out his hand.

Amalie hesitated, then took Philip's hand. She stammered, "How are you, Philip? You are looking well. You have hardly changed."

But Philip had changed. He was a man of twenty-five now, and though his deformed height had barely increased, his was the face of maturity. It was also Jerome's face, but kinder, more gentle, more thoughtful. There was a steadfast calm about Philip, as if he had come a long way, not without sadness

Catherine de Medici said "Mmmmm!"

Catherine, it seems, was not quite so heartless a hostess as she was cracked up to be. She did serve an occasional cup of nice, hot poison. But most of her dinner guests fared very well indeed, for she fed them heaping dishes of a new delicacy — ice cream!

As brides will, Catherine brought favorite family recipes from Florence to her husband's court. One of them was for ice cream. And the novelty-loving French, unused to such a rare delight, promptly lapped it up!

That was over four centuries ago. Yet ice cream remained a nobleman's luxury for many long years. Only in fairly modern times could its unique appeal be enjoyed by everybody — at every-day meals.

And it's only in modern times, too, that ice cream is recognized in its true light — not as a luxury, but as a valuable food. Like milk, butter and cheese, it furnishes both vitamins and calcium in generous amounts, and is a fine energy source as well. Good reasons why you find it so frequently starred by nutrition experts!

Today, again, you can satisfy war-suppressed appetites for all the ice cream you want, as often as you want it. We're glad to be able to restore it on your menus. And we'll continue to make ice cream of finest quality —striving always through research, to offer you the greatest possible benefits from milk, "nature's most nearly perfect food."

but also with immovable and compassionate courage.

"And you are just the same, Amalie," Philip said softly, still holding her hand.

Amalie, embarrassed, withdrew her hand. "And this is our daughter, Mary," she said.

Philip turned to the child, smiling. "Yes, I know. I have a pair of binoculars too."

Amalie drew in her breath, her face crimson. Then she laughed. "Oh, Philip! Don't tell me everyone—else—knows!"

"No," he reassured her.

Mary was staring at him, her blue eyes candid and pleased. "You look like my papa," she said. "Do you know my papa?"

"Yes, Mary, I am your papa's second cousin. My name is Philip Lindsey."

"Why don't you come to visit us?" asked Mary.

Amalie waited for Philip's answer. He said, "I have been away at Harvard, for postgraduate studies. I have just finished this June. But now I will be home. And if you want me to visit you, I shall be delighted."

"Where do you live?" asked Mary.

"Down on the hill, below you."

Mary's brows drew together. "You mean, in 'that house'?" she asked.

Philip smiled irrepressibly. "Is that what your papa calls it? Yes, I live in 'that house.'"

Mary, oblivious of her mother's embarrassment, said, "Papa says I mustn't go down there. He says gray stone men live down there."

"Mary!" exclaimed Amalie. "I never heard your father say that at all. You are just making it up, and you are very impolite!"

Mary turned to her with a severe look. "Mamma, I'm not making it up. You always tell me I make things up, but I don't. Papa told me that."

Philip considered the child with tenderness. "You look like your grandfather, my dear," he said.

Mary nodded. "Yes, I know. Papa and mamma told me."

"Let us sit down, Philip," said Amalie. "There is so much I want to know about you."

The three went to the bench and sat down. Mary was plainly fascinated by this new relative. She sat beside him and stared while he talked to her mother.

Philip told Amalie of his years at school. Now his father wished him to go into the bank.

"But your music!" said Amalie.

"My father has no other son, Amalie. If he—had married again, and there had been other children, it might have been different. I might, then, have done what I wished."

AMALIE'S eyes darkened. So here was another she had injured. "The bank is not as important as you, Philip," she said. "No one has a right to bury his talents."

Philip smiled. "I'm afraid I was just a dilettante, Amalie. Dilettantes have their place, but it is not convincing others that they are geniuses. Does Jerome still paint?"

"Only family portraits. He has painted me and the children."

"Well, if he had really been a genius, he could not have abandoned his talent. That is the test of genius: drive. I lacked it, as Jerome lacked it."

Amalie said, "You had more than a slight gift, Philip."

He took out his watch and glanced at it. A frail fairy note issued from the golden depths.

Mary was immediately entranced. "Oh, how pretty. Let me see it." She took it in her fingers delightedly, while Philip watched with amusement. She turned the watch over and read aloud: "To Philip from his loving mother —— Oh," she said softly. "From your mother. She is dead?"

Philip took the watch and replaced it in his pocket. "Yes, she is dead."

Amalie gazed at him, moved. "You still keep the watch, Philip."

"Yes, Amalie. Why not? I loved the one who gave it to me." He added, "And I still love her."

"Oh, Philip."

HE was silent, considering. He knew that she wanted to hear of the others. So he began quietly, "My father is well. He, too, has hardly changed except that his hair is almost gray. And Aunt Dorothea is ageless. She grows more energetic all the time. I think they are quite content."

"I am glad," whispered Amalie.

Mary had been listening to these incomprehensible remarks with curiosity. She said suddenly, "Can I go down to see you, Philip in 'that house'? Or won't they like me?"

"I am sure they would love you, Mary. But they are old people. There are no children there. I don't think you would enjoy it."

"But I could see you," the child insisted.

Philip gave this due consideration. "Well then, how would it be if I came up to see you sometime?"

Mary was delighted. 'Tomorrow?" she asked eagerly.

Philip and Amalie rose. Philip said, "Perhaps not tomorrow. But soon." He turned to Amalie. "May it be soon, Amalie?"

She hesitated. Then she said clearly, "Yes, yes."

They went toward the gates together, Mary holding Philip's hand.

Amalie said suddenly "Philip, do—they—still hate me?"

Philip said, without looking at her, "I don't think my father ever hated you, Amalie." He took Mary's small, flushed face in his hands and kissed her cheek. To Amalie's surprise, the child did not resent it, as she always resented familiarities from strangers.

Jim, waiting beside the carriage, saw them and stared unbelievingly.

"That house," as Jerome called it, had been unimaginatively christened The Pines. It had been built of bright red brick, decorated by four brilliantly white columns of wood at the entrance. There was an appearance of clean angularity about the house and its surrounding acres.

The interior had this same cold starkness. Dorothea had attended to the furnishing. She liked dark, hard woods and despised cushioning. The upholstery, stiff and reserved of color, did not invite lounging and dozing. If Alfred and Philip found no quiet and comfortable corners in which to read, no sense of seclusion, they were too grateful for Dorothea's excellent ordering of the house to complain.

Philip knew that she adored him. Much of her old devotion to Alfred had passed to Alfred's son. She was secretly delighted that his school days were over. She dreamed of his marriage to a satisfactory and well-dowered wife, who would not interfere with Dorothea's management of the home. Some quiet girl, who would give Alfred grandsons. What if darling Philip were deformed? He had a fine face. He was wealthy, cultured and traveled. He was a wonderful catch.

Not me! Though love may do its worst,

To ease my woe. Instead, I weep

Rheumatic fever can be beaten!

Though it tries to harm the hearts of growing boys and girls, serious damage may be avoided if the disease is recognized in time. Put your child to bed if he has persistent low fever, pain in joints or muscles, or continued loss of weight and appetite.

Then have your physician examine him!

If the disease attacks your child . . .

. . . make sure the doctor's orders are followed. He should stay under a doctor's care until all signs—including laboratory tests — show that no vestige of the attack remains.

Unfortunately, rheumatic fever may recur. After convalescence, therefore, be specially careful to guard your child against wet feet and chills.

Try to avoid exposing him to people with "sore throats" and colds. For recurrence may be brought on by these and other mild illnesses, such as grippe and certain respiratory infections.

Sometimes rheumatic heart disease may be present although there has been no previous record of a rheumatic fever attack.

The only way to discover this condition—and to prevent serious heart damage—is by periodic physical examination.

Rheumatic fever, itself, causes more fatalities among school-age children than any other disease. The way to combat this tragic toll is to maintain youngsters in the best possible condition by proper diet, rest, healthy exercise, and regular medical supervision.

IT'S Swift's ... SAY Prem!

Sally Tayntor had married the son of Mr. Kendricks, Alfred's lawyer, and had three bouncing little girls. Josephine was still unmarried. She was only four or five years older than Philip, and Dorothea saw to it that the young lady dined frequently at The Pines when Philip was at home.

It had been a grief almost unendurable when Alfred had informed Dorothea that he did not intend to marry again. Dorothea, at first hopeful, had finally contented herself with making a home for her cousin and Philip. She was no longer unhappy. She was almost fifty now, and her original passion for Alfred had solidified into a sisterly affection. She believed that Alfred was content.

Alfred sat beside Philip and looked tranquilly over the gardens. An elm tree near by threw a fretted shadow over the warm earth, and the evening sky was a veined turquoise.

Alfred said thoughtfully, "You will like our bank, Philip. It is stable, because our business is founded on land—on farms and sound real estate. Nothing dangerous or speculative." His expression became somber. "I am worried about the new spirit which is invading America. Of course I do not seriously believe that this threat will broaden and deepen. But the tendency is there. I believe in small and sound profits, which do not upset the equilibrium of society. And I believe such profits can come only from the land. Factories! Who will protect the workers there? Who will guard their health, their constitutional rights, so that they do not become a burden to society?"

Philip looked reflectively at a distant tree. "There has been much discussion of this, father. I read of it in the newspapers and in the periodicals. There are men who believe a new industrial age will bring more leisure and freedom for the common man."

"An evil, softening process!" protested Alfred.

Philip inclined his head. "Perhaps."

Alfred became almost excited. "An economy based on the soil is an economy of natural rhythm. It is steadfast. It inspires confidence in the continuity of government, the very continuity of personal and family life. It is an affirmation of the future."

Philip said, "Remember, father, I am only repeating the arguments of others. It is a fact, though, that America is tending to centralization and urbanization."

Alfred said, "I will do my best to maintain the old economy of the soil." He stood up. The disquiet in his eyes deepened. "You can see it here in Riversend. The well-paid workers in those abominable industrial works don't know what to do with themselves. They have nothing but their pay!"

Philip's eyes quickened as he looked at his father. "'Nothing but their pay!'" Yes, he thought, my father has begun to think. And this time he is right. But I wonder if he knows how right, and how profound, that statement of his is, and how full of sinister potentialities?

The dinner gong sounded and they went in together.

The dinner was excellent, hearty and quite unimaginative. Philip waited until both Dorothea and Alfred had been surfeited by their weighty meal. Then he said, "It was pleasant in the cemetery today. Your lilies were exquisite, Aunt Dorothea."

Dorothea said, "I know I should have gone myself. But I had so much to do."

Philip nodded. "I wish you had gone, Aunt Dorothea. I had the pleasure of seeing Jerome's little girl there. A beautiful child. She looks like her grandfather."

Both Dorothea and Alfred turned to him, their faces tightening. Philip calmly sipped his coffee.

"I trust," said Dorothea in a stifled voice, "that you did not speak, Philip."

Philip raised his eyebrows. "Why not? Such a pretty, fairylike child. It would have been impossible not to talk to her."

"Was—was anyone else there, Philip?" his father asked.

Philip put down his cup. "Yes. Her mother."

Philip said quietly, "I have been invited to Hilltop. I accepted the invitation tentatively."

Alfred turned quickly, as if incredulous.

Philip's voice was determined, but still gentle. "I am remembering that you own a half interest in that house, and that—later—that interest will come to me. I was born there; my happiest memories live within its walls. Sometimes I feel exiled." He paused. "I want to see my old home again. It is our home as much as it is Jerome's. More so, in fact."

Alfred stared at him in confusion. "You could," he suggested doubtfully, "arrange with—them—to let you go through the house and gardens, say, every few weeks. Doubtless they will be tactful enough to keep out of your way."

Philip repressed a smile. "That would be awkward," he said. "I think, perhaps, it would be best if I simply went up there naturally and looked about without previous notification of my coming."

Alfred frowned. "That would be the least awkward, I admit. But he—he might be there." His eyes, staring before him, burned darkly.

He will always hate Jerome, thought Philip. And it is something more than Amalie. He said calmly, "How will this be? I will never go there when I suspect Jerome might be on the premises."

Alfred said nothing, only looked before him fixedly.

Philip spoke with wiliness. "I have always admired one thing about you, father, more than any other. You have always been just. You could have made it so disagreeable for Jerome that he would have been compelled to leave that house. But you did not. For that he ought to be grateful. And in return, he ought not to object to my visiting my old home whenever I wish."

"He dare not object!" said Alfred strongly. He got up and went to a window. "Of course you need waste no words on—anyone—on your tours of inspection, Philip."

"Only as courtesy demands," Philip acceded. He said casually, "The little girl is very pretty, indeed. There is a quality about her which strongly reminds me of Uncle William. She has his eyes and his coloring. She is all New England. Not in the least like her mother, or her father either."

"I am really not interested in ——" said Alfred in a muffled tone. But he did not move.

Philip went on as if he had not heard his father: "Amalie has not changed much. She has some white threads in her hair." He paused. He said with affected hesitation, "She begged me to tell her that you did not hate her."

Alfred made an abrupt movement at the window, an involuntary movement of pain. Then he was still again.

"I said," Philip continued, "that I didn't believe you ever hated her. She seemed relieved." Philip did not mind lies that gave pleasure or peace to anyone, so he uttered a large one without scruple. "She asked about you in detail, father. I did not enlighten her, except to tell her that you were well and content. She said that she always remembered how kind you were, and how good."

Alfred was still silent; then he swung sharply about. He said, as if speaking from some inner compulsion, "I shall never forget Amalie. I have held her—almost—guiltless." He put his hand on his son's shoulder. "Philip, I know I can trust in your good taste, your discretion." He pressed Philip's shoulder strongly. Then he went away.

I hope, thought Philip uneasily, that I haven't said too much.

When the carriage began to climb the slope to Hilltop, this August evening, Jerome Lindsey felt suddenly deflated. This deflation was becoming more frequent with him. He did not know its cause. He had brought prosperity, good wages, opportunity and progress to Riversend. But there was something in all this which was ominous also. What was it?

Amalie and the children were waiting for him on the lawn. With the prescience of a woman who loves much, Amalie guessed that Jerome was perturbed as he alighted from the carriage. There was something in the set of his shoulders.

She bent toward little Mary and whispered, "Darling, do not tell papa just now about our meeting with Philip. I will tell him later."

The child lifted her eyes to her mother's face. "But why, mamma?"

Amalie set her mouth. "Because I tell you not to," she said crossly.

Mary was silent a moment. Then, flinging her mane back over her shoulders, she ran across the lawn to her father. Jerome held out his arms to her, and she jumped into them. He swung her high and kissed her soundly. She wound her arms about his neck, pressed her cheek to his. Her face glowed.

Moving sedately, Amalie approached Jerome, holding little William's fat warm hand. Jerome's hat had been knocked in the enthusiasm of his daughter's greeti His curling gray hair gave his dark and n row face a distinguished look. "It has been such a warm day," s Amalie casually as they walked together the flagged path to the house.

Jerome glanced at her quickly and su pressed a smile. He knew that Amalie h seen his irritation, and was giving him opening to unburden himself. He tweak her ear. "Nothing's wrong with me," said.

The cool and fragrant duskiness of t house soothed him, as it always did. Arm arm, he and Amalie went up the stairs their rooms. He saw the rosebud on dresser, and his eyes lighted. Jerome looked up sharply. "I hope he n't have the impudence to speak to you." Amalie raised her brows. "Impudence, ome? Of course he spoke. In fact, Mary covered him. I had a feeling he wouldn't ve made himself known if she had not nd him." She paused. "'Impudence' was ver exactly the word for Philip."

She was apprehensive when she saw that scars on her husband's face had turned a nt scarlet. He said, "I never had anyng against Philip. But I am sure you re discreet enough not to carry on any necessary conversation."

"It depends," said Amalie judicially, "on at you mean by 'unnecessary conversan.' We had a few things to say to each er. Philip is going into father's bank."

"What? No music?" ome's tone was sneer-, but Amalie saw his erest.

"No. I gathered he felt was his duty."

"Another one!" Jerome ghed shortly. "How ty' haunts this family! ll, I never did have much faith in his nts. I suppose he's grown up now. Has changed?"

"He's not much taller," Amalie told him, ut he is a man. In manner, and in a cern way of talking, he resembles your father y much."

Amalie was surprised when Jerome said, es. I always thought that too. Poor il," he added reflectively. "So he's going o the bank. I can't reconcile that with at I remember of Philip. But I suppose s become a stick too."

"No. You are wrong, Jerome. He is as was—only more so. I—I am very fond Philip."

Jerome turned and his expression was k. "How you two must have wallowed sentimentality!" he said. "One such epile is enough. Let that end it."

Amalie's temper was fast surging over its boundaries of caution. "That is not so easy, Jerome. He wishes to visit Hilltop."

"He does, eh? And I say no."

"You forget that he has an interest in this house."

Jerome was silent. He regarded his wife blackly. Then he said, "So. He wishes to come up here and spy."

"Philip? Spy?" Amalie was outraged. "How can you say that? He will not come, if you ask him not to. Are you going to?"

Jerome said, "When I cut away a certain part of my life, I made a clean cut."

Amalie's distress suddenly lightened. "We have no quarrel with Philip," she said with gentleness. "You two always liked each other. But he is sensitive, and I know he won't come when you are here, if you wish it that way."

Repentance never comes ahead.

Not what the fiddle wishes is being played on it.

To get up early three mornings is equal to one day of time.

"Well, if he wishes to come, he is within his legal rights, I suppose. Let him come, poor devil. Who am I to deny him a little pleasure?" He smiled again, still unpleasantly. "Have you arranged another meeting, my pet?" he added.

"Oh, don't be abominable, Jerome. You can be so petty. Philip may not come at all."

The dinner gong boomed softly through the house. Jerome rose. He held out his hand to Amalie and pulled her playfully to her feet. They went downstairs to dinner, hand in hand.

Jerome's depressed mood returned and did not lighten next day. When, at sunset, he rolled home in his carriage next evening, his thoughts were dark and confused. The road rose gently, rounded a sharp curve. Philip was strolling along, frolicking with a small white dog.

Jerome's first impulse was to drive on, looking straight ahead. Then a second impulse came, and he ordered the coachman to stop. Hearing his voice, Philip turned, smiled with genuine pleasure.

"Jerome!" he exclaimed, reaching the carriage.

"Well, Philip," said Jerome, slightly embarrassed. He extended his hand to the younger man.

Philip took his hand warmly. "It's been a long time, Jerome. I'm glad to see you."

"And I'm glad to see you," replied Jerome, suddenly surprised that this was true. He added, "Amalie told me you intend to visit Hilltop. Could you have dinner with us tomorrow evening?"

Philip hesitated. Then he said, "Yes. I think I can. Thank you." There was no embarrassment in his look or in his words, and Jerome thought, You could always rely upon Philip to do the natural and reasonable thing.

His old liking for the boy increased to warmness and friendliness. "I'd like you to see my bank," he said, "and the factories. We've made progress, Philip. You've been away so much you could hardly know what has been going on."

"Yes, I see there have been changes. I want to know about them. If you don't mind, I'd like to tour your bank and the factories tomorrow. Unless you are busy."

"I'd like you to see them," Jerome repeated. "Until tomorrow, then." He touched the brim of his hat in a friendly salute, and was driven on.

Philip created a minor furor when he entered Jerome's bank next morning. But his manner was natural and his voice was calm when he requested a clerk to inform Mr. Lindsey that Mr. Philip Lindsey wished to see him.

Speculation buzzed among the few customers. The final stupefaction came when Jerome was heard to call for his carriage, and the two went away together.

At two o'clock they were seen together at the hotel, where they ordered luncheon. Other diners stared at them furtively, tried to overhear their conversation. But Jerome and Philip seemed absorbed in each other; it was as if they were entirely alone.

"Well," said Jerome buoyantly, "what do you think of it all?"

Philip smiled. "I think Napoleon was very clever when he spoke about the ease with which he could build a new army. If you remember, he said that all he had to do was to offer escape from button factories."

Jerome frowned. "Button factories? I thought you'd be impressed, Philip."

Philip said, "I have often walked through the prettified sections where the workers in those factories live. I see men and women sitting vacantly on their stoops. Something is lacking in all this, Jerome. I'm not sure what it is. But increased leisure, more money for things is not the answer. I think men like you are making a grave error, but I don't know what the error is." To his surprise, Jerome was regarding him searchingly, almost eagerly.

Jerome said, with an attempt at flippancy, "You are going to be exactly like my father. Come on, now—you have reached some conclusion. What is it?"

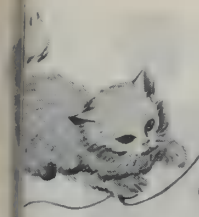
"You've felt it yourself, haven't you?"

"I don't know what you are talking about." Jerome looked at the steaks which had been placed before them.

Philip said, "Let us get back to the button factories. They produce things in volume, yes. But I do not feel that producing 'things' will give man all that his nature basically craves. Say what you will, the worker in the old days had a personal pride in what he made with his hands. Whatever he did, he stamped with his individuality. I have an uneasy fear that factories will rob man of his pride, his belief in his own value. Don't misunderstand me. I like the sound of industry; I think you are right in your prophecies of the future. But I don't think we must make a choice between individual happiness and pride, and mass production. I think the answer lies in combining them.

"Somehow we must discover something outside the monotony of factories, which will give man his necessary feeling of value, that he is contributing something peculiarly his own to the world. The bigger the place the machine takes in life, the smaller man will be squeezed. But man is a spiritual explosive. It is frightfully dangerous to compress explosives. They have a bursting point."

Jerome leaned his elbows on the table. He said softly, "So, Philip, you are joining the fight against the gray men too? Good! The gray men have left the land; they are invading industry now. I've felt this for a long time. I could never speak of it before to anyone. I'm grateful to you." His voice became more intense. "Contrary to what you may have heard, Philip, I am not 'money mad.' I've gotten a lot of it, yes; but as for money in itself, I have never really cared. Money earned by individual effort is the only money that contains any personal satisfaction."



Philip listened, nodding. Jerome was excited. He looked at Philip with an expression that kindled his dark features.

"I have been having my fears, too, Philip. I have felt, with you, that the expansion of the machine is lessening man's sense of innate integrity. I know that emotion is the basis of all men's lives. And all their happiness and emotion and drama are being sucked out of them by mechanisms. My friends would think me a heretic. But they are gray men, without imagination. Well, what is the answer?"

Philip sighed. "I don't know. Is it religion? Is it education? I don't know. I only know that man will have to find an active life apart from his work. Man's emotions can't be indefinitely suppressed. I think the first step must be decreased hours of work in factories, so that the monotony won't drive him mad."

"Yes, I know that. The men work nine hours a day in the Riversend factories instead of ten. But you've seen their faces during their hours of leisure. It's damnably confusing."

They finished their coffee in silence. Then Philip said, "Perhaps I'm not a practical man. I really know very little about all this. I only feel that man can't live objectively all the time. He must have some escape from the button factories."

Amalie, in soft gray taffeta, was waiting with the children. She was slightly nervous. When Jerome had informed her the night before that he had invited Philip to dinner, she had regarded him searchingly. Jerome was not given to doing things on impulse, and she suspected his motives.

But she saw that Jerome was all affability to Philip as they descended from the carriage. She came forward with the children, holding the two by their hands. Mary was dressed in white muslin and lace. Young William was sleepy, his dark curls a tangle on his round head.

Philip thought, What a picture they make! The children were presented to him, and he acknowledged their presence with grave courtesy. He watched as Jerome kissed his daughter with great tenderness; his son with casual affection.

"Philip, I'm so glad," said Amalie simply, as she touched his hand. She sent the children away then, and she and Jerome and Philip entered the house. She engaged Jerome in conversation in order that Philip might look his fill in the cool dimness of the hall.

"Nothing has changed," Philip said.

Amalie glanced about vaguely. "Hasn't it?"

The grandfather clock struck seven. Philip listened. How often he had heard those notes. Here was the library. It would not have surprised him had he seen Mr. Lindsey's long and emaciated figure in that old red leather chair.

Everything was poignant to him: the tall French windows which were only frames for painted scenes of garden, trees and grass; the high shelves of books; the long oaken table with its old lamp.

It was Jim who opened the dining-room doors, and Philip stopped to shake hands with him. "It's good to see you again, Mr. Philip," said Jim.

It seemed odd to Philip that only three places were set at the table. Jerome sat in old Mr. Lindsey's place now, and Amalie in Dorothea's. As for Philip, he sat where his father had sat. Amalie, who had expected some constraint, was happy to discover that there was none. But then, Philip had always been tactful and diplomatic.

They sat on the terrace in the twilight after dinner. Philip watched the lavender shadows stealing over the earth; he watched the silver curve of the moon rising over the copse of pines. He listened while Jerome spoke of his children, and particularly of Mary.

"The minx has quite a musical gift," he said, with an affectation of amused indulgence.

Philip was immediately interested. "I should like to hear the child play," he said. "But of course it is too late."

Jerome rose. "No. I don't think so. Has she gone to bed, Amalie?"

Mary had indeed gone to bed, but Amalie went to fetch her. The girl came down, swathed in the white silk ruffles of a pretty dressing gown, her blue eyes wide and bright.

Philip said, "Mary, I have heard that you play splendidly. Would it be too much if you played just one selection for me before I go?"

The faintest of blushes ran over the child's face; she dropped a small curtsy. "Thank you. It will give me pleasure," she replied with the artificial poise of a well-bred young girl. She smiled at Philip primly, and without embarrassment sat at the piano.

A look of absorption came into her eyes. Her small white hands moved softly over the keys. Philip began to recognize a theme of Chopin's. But the child was improvising. Philip was astonished. The technique was both childish and mature. Mary's head was thrown back; it was evident that she was not aware of her parents or of Philip. She was entranced in some dream of her own, aware of nothing but her music. Beyond the windows the night was still and warm and dark; the music invaded it like a loud and harmonious voice. Then, abruptly, the piano was silent. Mary turned shyly. She looked at her father.

Jerome smiled. "Her teacher says she has talent. What do you think?"

"Extraordinary," said Philip. He regarded the girl with gravity.

She stood up, hesitated; then she said, "My mamma says you play too. Would you play for me?"

Philip bowed. "It will give me the greatest pleasure, my dear."

He sat down before the piano. He began to play the second part of the first movement of Schubert's Symphony No. 8 in B Minor. Now the keys responded with a great cry, a wild and discordant imploring that tore at something primitive and terrible in the human heart. Then, mingling with these cries, moved a gentler, more majestic theme, soft and compassionate.

Mary had moved so close to Philip that she almost touched him. She fixed her eyes on his face; her mouth had opened slightly. Jerome had taken Amalie's hand, but he, too, looked at Philip. The sweetness and majesty were almost unbearable, stately and exultant. Mary's face was wet with tears. When he had played the last note, and had turned to her, smiling, she looked into his eyes. His smile abruptly disappeared. She turned suddenly and ran from the room.

An old-fashioned mother nearly broke up a woman's club meeting when asked how she brought up children. Her brief and pointed speech was as follows: "I feed 'em good, old-fashioned food. When they want to wade in the mud, I let 'em. If they don't get up when I call 'em or try sassing me or doing something I've warned 'em not to do, I cut off a peach sprout and give 'em a good tanning. I get out and romp with 'em every day, if I have time. When they get a stomachache, I dose 'em myself. That's about all I do to keep 'em in line, except that if they get in bad with the teacher at school I usually find out why; and if the teacher's licked 'em and they needed it, I give 'em another, so's they'll remember it. And they really do pretty well."

—DELINEATOR

"I have frightened the poor little creature," he said, rising from the stool.

"Oh, no," said Amalie. "She is so sensitive, and music often disturbs her. But I've never seen her so moved."

"All New England," said Jerome. He seemed abstracted. "You certainly haven't lost your gift, Philip."

Philip's expression became withdrawn and polite. He drew out his watch. "I must really go now," he said. "Thank you for a delightful evening. Are you sure I haven't frightened the child?"

They reassured him with affection. Jerome called his carriage. They shook hands. Jerome said, "I have enjoyed your coming, Philip. Please come often."

The winter day was all fiery blue and white. The holidays long since had been forgotten, and the townsmen looked forward to the spring. Jerome, from his office windows, could see the thick white plush of the snow on the lawn which surrounded the bank. He and Philip and General Tayntor sat at a small table and sipped brandy. Papers were spread upon the table, papers which the general was regarding skeptically.

The general had weathered, rather than aged. His wicked, ruddy face had thinned, but it still wore its air of twinkling cunning and knowingness. He tapped the papers with a lean finger. "This will cost a lot of money, this infernal 'Riversend Community,'" he said. "Who's to foot it, eh?"

Philip glanced humorously at Jerome, who said, "You've got a lot of money, general. You're almost a millionaire, and you have me to thank for it, to a great extent. What do you want with all that money, anyway?"

The general grinned. "You mean I'm an old man, and I've got enough? Nobody ever has enough." He turned to Philip. "What does your dad think of this, your being here as cozy as a bug in a rug?"

Philip said, smiling, "My father respects my judgment."

"First time I ever heard of Alfred Lindsey respecting anybody's judgment but his own. Think I'll mention this to the state examiners."

Philip indicated the papers. "I'm willing to put up twenty thousand dollars of my own—not from my father's bank. Jerome will do the same. We thought you might wish to contribute, for the good of the Community. The Widow Kingsley is willing to advance ten thousand, and there are others. When you consider it over a long range, the scheme will pay its own dividends."

"Visionary! Anarchistic!"

Philip said coolly, "We are making an experiment, an experiment in humanity."

"Ho! Damn humanity! It's come to a pretty pass when you pay a man more than he's worth, then worry about his soul! This cattle hasn't any soul. Isn't it enough that Jerome's got hours reduced to nine a day? What more do they want?"

"They want to live, too, general."

The general looked from Philip to Jerome suspiciously, his eyes narrowed so tightly that they almost disappeared. "Come on," he said to Jerome, "what's behind this? It isn't love for humanity. I know you too well."

Jerome said, "You are right. It isn't. Rather you could call it hatred for the kind of men I've always hated. The killers of joy and gaiety. The gospel-shouters of 'work.'" He stood up and began to walk up and down the room. "I meet these men regularly. I wonder at their barrenness of heart, their drabness of imagination. If they can find nothing better to do with their own lives than work, one wouldn't mind. But they impose their dusty laws on others too. They try to imprison all men in their jails."

The general scratched his ear, but his eyes, fixed upon Jerome, were intent and curious.

Philip spoke: "I think what Jerome is trying to say is that a mechanical civilization does moral violence to the subjective nature of man. Man cannot live by machines alone, nor by the things they produce. He must have something else. Jerome, in our Riversend Community, hopes to give the local workers that 'something else.' He will buy two hundred acres of land to the west of Riversend, and allow every worker to buy an acre, on easy payments financed by this bank. The worker and his family will raise what they will—flowers, vegetables, chickens. He will not be divorced from the land. We think it a dangerous thing for men to be divorced from the land. If men must work in factories, they must have earth to stand on afterward, their own earth."

The general tapped the papers again. "Well, I agree with you about the land. But what about his 'education'? Teaching factory hands to 'enjoy' books! Teaching them what American citizenship means! Getting the parsons and the priests to help! They won't!"

"They will," said Philip. "We've talked to several ministers, and to the Catholic priests. We've talked to teachers and others. We'll have classes in the skilled trades, recitals by workers who can play musical instruments. We'll have tinsmith shops, carpenter shops, handicraft. We'll have a store where these things can be sold. All these things will be done after working hours, on holidays, week ends."

"What rot!" muttered the general.

"Playgrounds for children," went on Philip. "And for the women, instruction in household matters, child care, cooking, sewing."

"Visionary! You'll have the whole country down on your necks! You'll be laughed out of existence."

Philip winked surreptitiously at Jerome. "What do you say, general? Will you donate a few thousand dollars? Think of your name in the newspapers. We're going to give the matter a lot of publicity."

The general stood up. "You're mad." He scowled. "How much? I won't put in a cent more than five thousand dollars."

Philip and Jerome stumbled over each other in their haste to shake his hand.

The general glared at them. "I'm going demented in my old age. You can pray I don't change my mind."

In a big city the twin spirits Romance and Adventure are always abroad. . . . Without knowing why, we look up suddenly to see in a window a face that seems to belong to our gallery of intimate portraits; in a sleeping thoroughfare we hear a cry of agony and fear coming from an empty and shuttered house; . . . we exchange glances of instantaneous hate, affection and fear with hurrying strangers in the passing crowds; a sudden souse of rain—and our umbrella may be sheltering the daughter of the Full Moon and first cousin of the Sidereal System; at every corner handkerchiefs drop, fingers beckon, eyes besiege, and the lost, the lonely, the rapturous, the mysterious, the perilous, changing clues of adventure are slipped into our fingers. But few of us are willing to hold and follow them. We are grown stiff with the ramrod of convention down our backs. We pass on; and someday we come, at the end of a very dull life, to reflect that our romance has been a pallid thing of a marriage or two, a satin rosette kept in a safe-deposit drawer, and a lifelong feud with a steam radiator.

—O. HENRY: From The Green Door, from The Four Million (Doubleday, Doran & Co., Inc., copyright 1904).

Dorothea was pruning the lilac bushes. Her garden was only thirteen years old, and Alfred had said it took much more than thirteen years to make a garden. It was unlike Alfred to say things like that, she reflected. It was not so much his words; there seemed to be a deeper undertone to what he said these days. Alfred had changed. When had he changed? She could not remember. But she saw now that he was a different man—somber, abstracted, given to weighing matters doubtfully, whereas at one time he had had an instant and dogmatic opinion. He was tired. He was very tired. She knew this now.

Philip's little white dog, that had been sniffing busily among the shrubs, suddenly emerged, barking shrilly. He ran toward the gate excitedly. Dorothea called to him. He glanced back at her, still barking. A young girl was leaning on the gate, gazing over it.

Dorothea said coldly, "What is it? Are you looking for someone?"

The girl was tall and slender in her printed muslin dress. She had a delicate, cool face, finely cut and firm. She said, "Philip lives here, doesn't he?"

"Philip? Who are you, my girl?"

The girl smiled. "I am Mary Lindsey. And you must be my Aunt Dorothea. My real aunt. Not Philip's." She put her hand on the gate, opened it and stepped inside. Dorothea watched her, numbed. Mary tossed back her hair; the sun, coming out from behind its cloud, shone suddenly and brilliantly on that mass which hung below her waist. "How do you do, Aunt Dorothea?" said Mary formally.

She has my father's face, thought Dorothea. She has his eyes, and his movements. She is my own flesh and blood, my niece.

Mary was glancing about her at the garden. "I wonder why I was told I mustn't come here?" she asked in a musing voice.

Dorothea said with faint bitterness, "Have you asked your father?"

Mary smiled. "Yes. He was very indefi-. It seems he doesn't like anyone here Philip." She studied Dorothea coolly. ou don't seem very formidable, Aunt orothea. I have just come home from Miss ch's school on the Hudson. I thought I'd e to see if Philip were home."

He is not. He is at his father's bank." orothea hesitated. Her eyes had dimmed te unaccountably. "So you are Mary."

Yes."

Let me see—you are about fourteen, n't you, child?"

Almost. Next February."

A young lady," murmured Dorothea. Mary inclined her head with stately gra-sness. "Yes. I am going to marry Philip en I am seventeen or eighteen."

Dorothea stared at the girl, blinking her s.

I haven't told him yet, of course," Mary tinued. "But I shall soon. That is why I e down here. I think it is so silly that I uldn't know my own aunt and Philip's her."

Dorothea glanced involuntarily at the se. It happened that Alfred was home ay, with one of his headaches. Dorothea s alarmed. Alfred must not see this girl.

I think," Dorothea said, "that you ought ask your father's permission to come here, ld."

He would not give it to me," said Mary. know that. It's so foolish. Aren't you ng to kiss me, Aunt Dor-ea?"

She moved forward and orothea regarded her in pefaction. She saw that ary was presenting her eek. To her own further pefaction, Dorothea nd herself bending to-rd the girl. Her lips ached flesh as soft and eet as a rose.

Something happened to orothea then. Something lted and flowed in her e tears. She put her nd on Mary's shoulder d looked into those aloof ue eyes. She said, "Mary. ary."

Mary's smile became ntle. "Aunt Dorothea," e answered.

Dorothea, her eyes moist and aching, said rriedly, "My dear, you must not come re again without your father's express per-ission. It would be wrong and undutiful."

"I have every intention of telling papa. ut he was not at home this morning, and I uld not ask him then."

That, Dorothea thought with mournful ony, is what papa would have called sophis-y. Mary had a pure and untouched look, delicate transparency. But Dorothea was ddenly enlightened, and not without nusement. This was a resolute child, with iet and determined strength. There was ndsey steel in her. She searched the girl's ce for resemblances to Jerome and Amalie, ut there were none. She is more my father's ughter than theirs, thought Dorothea with athetic gratitude.

"You have a little brother, too, haven't ou?" she asked.

"Yes. William is nine years old, and a other. Little boys can be very annoying, nd he is mamma's pet, which makes him orse."

MARY had an air of disarming frankness. Dorothea studied her with new affection. There was such a cleanness and freshness bout the girl.

"I am about to have my luncheon," she aid, suddenly reckless. "Will you join he?" What did it matter if Alfred saw this eautiful young girl? Dorothea had the ddest thought that Alfred would not be isturbed. That was part of the change hich had come to him.

Mary accepted the invitation with the nost matter-of-fact manner. She looked bout her as she accompanied Dorothea into the house. Dorothea saw this, and again her voice was embittered when she said:

"This is not like Hilltop, is it, Mary?"

"I think Hilltop the nicest place in the world," replied the girl. "But this could be very nice, too, if there was just a little more sun in the rooms."

Dorothea said, "They do not make fabrics and rugs as they did once. These might fade if I allowed too much sunlight to come in."

"Oh, everything is faded at Hilltop. And I think it charming."

DOROTHEA was annoyed, then she hesitated. She drew back the draperies at the windows of the living room and let the sun pour in, though she winced when she saw it splashing in golden pools upon her best Brussels carpeting.

She said, "Sit down, my dear. I shall consult the servants about setting another place."

She went upstairs. She felt both excited and pleased. She knocked on Alfred's door, opened the door and stood on the threshold.

"Alfred! We have a visitor! I do hope you do not mind." She regarded him eagerly. "It is Mary. Jerome's daughter. I have invited her to have luncheon with me," Dorothea went on. "She is such a sweet child. But it is not necessary for you to come down. If you wish, you may have a tray in your room."

Alfred saw that Dorothea was flushed and tremulous. "That is not necessary," he said. "I shall be glad to join you."

"How kind of you, Alfred! I must speak to Elsie about another place," said Dorothea, and hurried away.

Alfred went slowly and heavily down the stairs, and into the living room.

The girl stood up and curtsied. "I am Mary Lindsey, sir," she said politely. "And I presume you are Philip's father."

"Yes, my dear." Alfred held out his hand to her, and she took it without shyness. She surveyed him frankly.

"I think you are my second cousin, sir?" Mary asked.

Alfred hesitated. "Yes, that is correct, Mary. But I was adopted by your grandfather, so I am your adopted uncle. You may call me Uncle Alfred. It is unfortunate that Philip will not be home for luncheon, but I hope you will not be too bored by us."

"Oh, I am sure I will not," she assured him seriously. "Philip has spoken of you and Aunt Dorothea so often that I feel I already know you." She remembered her manners, sedulously taught in Miss Finch's school. "I hope you will not be bored by me, nor think it presumptuous of me to come here without invitation."

"I do not think it necessary for you to wait for invitations," said Alfred. "Please come often. We'll be delighted to see you."

She waited for him to seat himself, then sat near him, her hands folded in her muslin lap.

He asked her about her school and she informed him that this was her first year away from home. Her papa had not wanted her to go, but mamma had insisted. Now papa was quite reconciled. He thought she, Mary, had improved very much. She had a most excellent music teacher. The girls were often escorted to New York to see opera, and sometimes to a play. There were so many things to see in New York.

She turned her profile to Alfred for a moment, and its outlines, cool and clear, caught at his heart. It was William Lindsey's profile. But there was something else too. There was a certain tilt to her head, a certain shadowy modeling about her cheekbones which hinted of Amalie.

He said, "I once lived at Hilltop, Mary. Before you were born. I still remember and love it."

Mary looked at him quickly. "I did not know. Why did you leave? I should have loved it to have Philip there."

Alfred was silent. When he saw that Mary was waiting for his answer, he said, "After all, it is best for a family to be alone. Two families can often become very tiring to each other. I—I thought it proper to take my own family away, and build a home of our own."

"But Aunt Dorothea is my father's sister," said Mary, puzzled. "She ought to have stayed with us."

Alfred's smile was somber. "But your—father—had your mother, my dear. I had no one. So Dorothea came with us."

Mary fixed her eyes upon him penetratingly. She knew that he had not told her everything, and she had a child's natural curiosity which had grown over the years. "But you never visit Hilltop. Don't you like my papa and my mamma?"

Alfred stood up, stung by pain. He said in a stifled tone, "Yes, I liked your mother very much. But sometimes families are incompatible. . . . Was that the gong I just heard?"

Dorothea rustled into the room then, to Alfred's deep thankfulness. Mary rose properly when her aunt entered.

She thought the luncheon very plain and tasteless, quite unlike the spirited meals at home. No wonder darling Philip came so often to Hilltop. The silence and the chill must be disagreeable to him too.

Dorothea suddenly became anxious. "But your mother, my dear: will she not wonder where you are, and why you have not appeared for luncheon?"

Mary shook her head. "I had an earlier luncheon with my brother, in his nursery. Mamma is entertaining Mrs. Kingsley today, and she told me to keep William away from them. Mrs. Kingsley doesn't like children." Mary considered this thoughtfully. "I don't blame her, really. Little boys, especially, can be very tiresome."

Dorothea had a sudden swift memory of her own guardianship over the obstreperous Jerome so many years ago. She, too, had often been warned to assist the nursemaid in keeping Jerome away from the guests.

She turned to Alfred. He was smiling. He, too, was thinking of the things that were filling her own mind. It had been a long time since Dorothea had experienced this sense of warmth and understanding, this closeness.

Then Dorothea remembered that Mary had been remiss in her duty. "But you left your brother alone," she reminded her niece, with an attempt at severity. "That was quite wrong."

—JAMES STEPHENS: The Crock of Gold. (Macmillan Company.)

MARY was not abashed. "I had had enough of him for two hours," she said. "I gave Margie, his nurse, an old locket of mine on her promise to keep him away from mamma and Mrs. Kingsley. She said she would tie him down if she had to. Of course he roars," she added reflectively. "But Margie can keep the doors shut."

Once Dorothea had locked Jerome in a closet. She stared at the tablecloth, remembering. Her grim mouth shook in a smile. It did not occur to her until later that she had recalled these memories of Jerome without bitterness or hatred.

Mary refused a drive home. She liked the walk. She left messages for Philip, composedly kissed her Aunt Dorothea, and then Alfred, thanked them for the luncheon, and sedately went away.

Dorothea and Alfred watched her tall slender figure climbing steadily up the hill. When she was some distance away she turned to wave to them. They both felt a poignant sense of loss.

"Really, Mary!" exclaimed Amalie, v perturbed. "I can't think what your fat will say when we have to tell him. Un you do not tell him."

"Oh, I intend to," said Mary placi "He never said expressly that I should visit Uncle Alfred and Aunt Dorothea."

Amalie sighed resignedly. "Don't use t sophistry on me, my girl. You've kno surely, that you should not go down th You have not been in ignorance of y father's—feelings—about that family."

MARY smoothed her hair with both han then shook it back again. "Mamma," said quietly, "I am almost fourteen ye old. I am not really a child any long Don't you think I ought to know why th is such a feeling about Philip's family?"

Amalie was silent. The girl was rig Someday, perhaps very soon, she would h the story. It might be garbled. Peo could be so merciless. Amalie knew t Mary had a deep capacity for emotion, spite of her surface tranquillity. The b facts might be shocking enough. Howev she paused. Mary was not yet fourte after all. What could she know of hum passions? Would she blame her parents

Amalie, despairing again, said, "At time I was married to Alfred Lindsey."

Mary moved quickly. She turned a gazed steadfastly at her mother.

Amalie twisted her fingers together. "W all lived together at Hilltop then. Y father came home for the wedding. Y papa and I—your papa and I—decided loved each other. a few months lat Alfred and I w divorced, and your pa and I were married.

"Divorced!" s Mary.

Amalie frowne "Surely you know wh divorce means, Ma Of course divorce rather—unusual. B sometimes it is nec sary." She could r read Mary's large bl eyes. They had r moved from her mot er's face. All at on it came to her with shock that Mary w admiring her.

"Why, mamma," said Mary, almost wi wonder, "you must have been very co rageous!"

Mary was scrutinizing her mother wi profound interest. Mamma was not d then. Mamma had been daring and you and strong; she had had courage to do a m outrageous and adventurous thing. Ma was excited her budding sense of roman stirred. And papa! How gallant, how ir sistible he must have been! Mary decid that she had never loved her parents much.

"So," she said dreamily, "that is why o families don't visit. Uncle Alfred must ha been hurt, wasn't he?"

Amalie moved her head restlessly. "I b lieve he was," she said, still dumfounded what she had seen in her daughter's fa "But he is a very sensible man. I am su he holds no grudge. But things are som what awkward, you see. So we think it be to have nothing to do with the family dow there."

"Yes," said Mary. "I think I see. Unc Alfred asked about you, mamma. Wh didn't he marry again too?"

"I'm sure I don't know!" exclaim Amalie. "After all, he had been marri twice. Perhaps he thought that enough She stopped. "What did he ask you abo me, Mary?"

"He wanted to know if you were st pretty." Mary concentrated on her moth with new eyes. "I didn't know it then, but know it now. He still likes you, mamma Amalie rose. She spoke in an odd voic "Mary, your papa is going to be very angr I—I think you ought to tell him yourself.

think you ought to tell him what I have told you. I don't want to be there when you do."

Mary nodded. Her smile was secret and mature.

"I think he will tell you not to go down there again, Mary. And you must obey him."

"I don't think children should obey stupid commands," said Mary with composure. "And I like to visit my relatives."

Amalie gasped. She turned quickly on her daughter. "Why, Mary! How can you say such things? Can't you realize that parents sometimes give children commands beyond the understanding of foolish girls?"

"No," said Mary. "After all, I am not a child. I am old enough to form my own opinions. I think papa will see that too. He always listens to me."

Jerome was white with rage. He and Mary were sitting together in her room. Mary had invited him there after dinner.

If he was almost speechless with his anger, Mary was all calm. "You must not blame mamma," she was saying. "She did not know I was going. In fact, I left the house without her knowledge. When I returned, mamma was very angry with me. I insisted that she tell me about everything. So she told me. I am not in the least shocked. I think it exciting. Of course," she continued reflectively, "I need not have told you or mamma at all. But I think that would have been wrong. There is no sense in being dishonest and sneaking."

Jerome had never struck his daughter in all her life. Now he had the most brutal desire to do so. He said thickly, "You knew I did not want you to go down there. But you deliberately disobeyed!"

Mary winced internally. She was frightened of her father for the first time in her life. But she lifted her chin, though her color was gone.

Jerome felt a tautness, a burning in his scars. This incensed him even more against Mary. He stood up now, went to the girl and struck her violently across her face. Mary did not cry out. She merely lifted her head higher. The imprints of Jerome's hand sprang out in crimson on her white cheek. She regarded him steadily. Suddenly he hated himself for that blow. But his voice, though unsteady, was still thick when he spoke.

"I want you to understand this. You must never go down there again."

Mary said, "There is something here I don't understand, papa. If anyone should be angry, it is Uncle Alfred, not you. You took mamma away from him."

"Your mother is a fool for telling you," Jerome said. "She ought to have known that you would not understand. Someday, perhaps, you will. Then you will know why I must tell you never to go down to that house again. I'm sorry, my darling."

"If that is your express command, papa, I shall obey," said Mary.

"Thank you, my dear." Jerome left her then. He had intended to call Amalie and upbraid her viciously. But now he felt only misery, and an increasing sense of loss.

OUR READERS WRITE US

I want a home that my children will enjoy and can bring their friends to and I also want a place where my husband and I can have some privacy. I do all my own work and expect I always will, except for the help of my children as they grow older. I won't mind doing my own work if the kitchen and laundry are planned efficiently and there is not a lot of running up and down stairs.

The house I live in now was planned with an idea of torturing women. A bedroom between the dining room and kitchen. A large and inefficient kitchen. The sink is too low. And I could go on and on about the woodwork and moldings that catch dust; the long windows that rattle and that are in all the wrong places.

If there is a chance that in the not-too-distant future we can plan and hope for a house like the ones you show, I won't let myself get too discouraged. I can dream, can't I?

Sincerely,
MRS. M. BERTSCHI.

Dear Mrs. Bertschi: I hope your dream will soon come true. You may have seen in the papers that a bill has been introduced in Congress by Senators Taft, Ellender and Wagner, which, among other progressive features, would make it possible to buy or build a $5000 home for $250 down with 32 years in which to pay off the balance and with an interest rate of only 4 per cent. This would make the original payment as well as the monthly payments very low indeed and should bring a $5000 home well within the reach of a $40-a-week family income.

All this in my opinion makes sense. But there is something else which has to make sense before a $5000 house can be a really adequate home for an average American family. It must be twice as much house as you can buy today for $5000. It must be planned by the country's finest architectural talent to do all the things you long for in your letter to make housekeeping easy and family life healthy and pleasant. It must be designed, built, equipped and finished to reduce running costs to a hitherto unheard-of minimum and eliminate the customary repairs and replacements. It should be part of a community as carefully planned as the house itself.

And now, such a house in this technological age of ours is not only possible, but it should be child's play for present-day scientists, engineers, architects and manufacturers to achieve and produce. Unfortunately, the homebuilding industry on the whole is uncoordinated. And it is beset by conflicting interests of labor, lenders, land speculators and manufacturers. And it seems to me that the only hope for you and all the rest of us is the prompt establishment of some over-all governmental guidance group which will initiate research into new, better and much less expensive materials and indicate to the industry how it can best get together for its own good. This guidance is the most vital feature of the housing legislation I mentioned. If you are really interested, I suggest you write your congressmen to fight for that feature.

Thank you for writing.

Sincerely,
RICHARD PRATT,
Associate Editor.

You Can't Sell It

Hammond, Indiana.

Dear Editors: The five and six room bungalows with the wide front porches that were built row upon row about 20 years ago are considered old-style today. Just as the modern shacks advocated by architects such as Richard Pratt will be considered old-style 20 years from now.

Since working for a real-estate man, I have learned that one of the most important things in building a home is to keep in mind what the market value will be if the owner is forced to sell later. Will the modernistic home be as marketable as Georgian, Regency, Cape Cod, English, Dutch Colonial, and so forth? Try selling a chair or a chest 20 years old. If it is of the style which was called modern 20 years ago you'll have a hard time getting rid of it. However, if it is a definite traditional piece, you'll get the maximum price.

A home should express the occupant's personality and taste just as his clothing does. The JOURNAL indicates by its policy that people have no individual tastes and preferences. When I come home at night, I want to be able to find my house without counting off from the corner: "Ours is number four," or, "This one is mine because the one with the gasoline pumps out in front is the filling station!"

—But You Can Live in It!

South Bend, Indiana.

Dear Editors: I am very much interested in the homes you are showing, and amused by the "chicken coop" designation. I have been living in a "chicken coop" for nearly four years, in a government project of 250 homes, designed and built for war workers.

My "chicken coop" is the last word in convenience. We have four rooms, bath and basement. The house is built on two levels, with the bedrooms and bath on the higher level. We have living room and kitchen below, and basement beneath them. Company may be served in the living room. We have very large windows, cross-ventilation and no west windows, to keep out the summer heat. We also have a gas furnace. I have no desire to live in the conventional type of home again. The housekeeping duties are so light that I felt it my duty to take a full-time job in an essential industry during the war, and I am still working.

Very truly yours,

England Volunteers for Peace

London, England.

Dear Mrs. Gould: The Cabinet has asked that WVS (Women's Voluntary Services for Civil Defence) continue in its present form during the transition period. We are, therefore, changing to peacetime work. Actually, post-war reconstruction is so very like post-raid reconstruction that the adjustment comes almost naturally.

There was here a revulsion of will for hard work immediately after the cease-fire with Japan, but I am glad to say that a return to real action is seen now everywhere. Our people at WVS felt for a time that they had made their full contribution during the war, and could return to "normal life." They now say that what they learnt in the war has gone deeper than they had recognized, and they would like to continue to contribute to the life of the nation. I am quite sure that if this spirit of service can be held, great objectives will be reached.

Feeding and clothing are our two great immediate problems. Housing is the worst headache anyone has, but this winter we have urged everyone who has a spare room to take someone in. We have also a scheme for Temporary Houses and Prefabricated Permanent Houses. Through the Rehoming Scheme—donations of furniture from people in the country to blitz victims—84,845 families have been helped to restart a home. (It is impossible to buy furniture, bedding, beds without a docket.)

The WVS is helping with Emergency Feeding and all the side lines of feeding that we were busy on before—the Agricultural Pie schemes, School Feeding, etc. We are also doing a job with Make-Do-and-Mend and Clothing Exchanges. You possibly remember that people bring outgrown children's clothes to the Exchanges, have them pointed and draw larger clothes. No money passes, but the textiles are used over and over again.

I think everyone is beginning to get a "second wind," but I must admit the last few months have been difficult. It is nice to feel that they are behind instead of ahead of us.

Yours sincerely,
STELLA READING.

CONVERSATION PIECE

chopped (not ground) pecans. This recipe will use about ⅓ pound nuts and will make about thirty balls. These are deceptively easy to do, for they're really exceptional and bound to become a spécialité de la maison of all your guests.

 * * FROSTED GRAPES * * ***

Using a pair of scissors, separate 2 large bunches of grapes into small sections, leaving a piece of stem on each little bunch. For color contrast, use both Malaga and Tokay grapes if you can get them. Stir together 1½ cups sugar and ¾ cup water, bring it to a rolling boil, then let it continue to boil for five minutes, no longer. Remove from fire and begin dipping the grapes. Holding the stem, dip each little bunch in the sirup, then sprinkle at once with granulated sugar and transfer to a greased platter. Be generous with the sugar. When all the grapes are coated you'll want to stand gazing in admiration at what you've accomplished, but don't do it. Put the platter in the refrigerator at once. To serve, make an attractive arrangement of grapes and pecan-cheese balls on the same serving dish. Attractive, did I say? They'll look far too good to eat, but don't let this worry you.

Service. The food is bound to be heavenly and the doing of it is not difficult; I love foolproof recipes, and these are all in that class. But the headwork involved in the engineering of this little supper is something else indeed—so let's work out a foolproof recipe for that.

The trick is to have everything ready for full steam ahead the minute you reach home or the bridge game is over. If you're one of those lucky girls who have a tray-size electric hot plate with a unit low enough to keep food hot without cooking it, the trick couldn't be easier. Plug it in early in the evening and put all the hot food on it—even make your coffee ahead of time if you want to. Bring the chicken and broth to the boiling point before transferring to the hot plate, but you needn't preheat the bread. Cover the whole thing with an inverted oblong roasting pan. This will help retain the heat. I do hope y have an electric hot plate, but from here I'll assume you haven't.

Here's the plan. Before you leave t house—or if it's bridge, before your gue arrive—have ready on the stove for la minute heating, the Poulet Curry à la Crèt in a double boiler, the chicken broth a your coffeepot with coffee in it. (No wat of course, unless it's a percolator.) T grilled bread will be in the oven. On counter or table put a plate for the sar wiches, the chafing dish or serving bowl, t dish of chutney and a tureen or pitcher the broth. In the refrigerator are the gra and pecan-cheese balls arranged on th serving dish, and the sandwiches s wrapped in a towel.

If you have a double-decker serving ca arrange the lower deck with all the dish silver and napkins to be used, leaving t upper deck free for the food. If you do have one, use two small tables: one for t dishes, and so on, and one for the food. B do plan to serve your supper in the livi room; it's fun for this kind of party.

And now to the zero hour. If you're pla ing bridge it's a cinch to slip unobtrusive kitchenward while scores are totaled a bridge tables removed. If you're out, u mirror and lipstick on the way home and y can count on a precious five minutes or mo in the kitchen while the other girls repa their make-up.

Turn on three burners of the stove; p chicken broth on one, teakettle on anoth and double boiler on the third. Light t oven and turn it as low as possible. Fill t lower part of the chafing dish with water a light the burner under it—or put servi bowl in the oven with the grilled bread.

By the time the teakettle boils everythi will be ready. Pour water into the coffeepo transfer chicken to chafing dish or bow broth to tureen or pitcher, and away you to the living room with your little feast th will seem to have appeared by a miracle a will taste like one.

THE STORY OF THE KEITHS—

It was Rhythm and romance for Jean and Alan as they traced the exotic pattern of the rhumba. Between dances, Alan naturally couldn't keep his eyes off Jean's complexion—divinely smooth "and most divinely fair." She credits its softer texture to Camay care—says "My first cake of Camay helped awaken the sleeping beauty of my skin."

Sentimental Journey. Gay and romantic, the Keiths stopped off at Niagara Falls on their honeymoon—and the Maid of the Mist never sailed with a lovelier bride. "I'll try to stay a bride, always," says Jean. "I'll try to keep my skin smooth and radiant—I'll stick with the Camay Mild-Soap Diet."

"Word of Honor," adds Jean, "with the Camay Mild-Soap Diet it's no trick at all to gain a lovelier complexion." Camay is really mild—it cleanses without irritation. Simply cream Camay's gentle lather over your face, night and morning. Rinse warm—add a cold splash for oily skin. Your beauty blooms! Doctors proved just one cake of Camay can mean fresher, more alluring skin.

NICODEMUS

ıd magazines, or made speeches about it on e air. They gave Henry the inside story, ıich always directly contradicted anything se that had ever appeared in print.

Now upon the first day of the week, very early the morning, they came unto the sepulchre, inging the spices which they had prepared.

Never once had she regretted marrying enry. She loved him, although Henry and s crowd did not admire love. They admired othing. They were too intelligent for en-ıusiasm or hope; they permitted themselves belief except the opinion that all men, ex-pt themselves, were fools and no good ould come of it. When the children were ung, Laura had been too absorbed to ques-on the belief that all men were fools. But tely—since Ted went to war and Betsy arried—she had come to believe, privately, ıat Henry and his crowd were gullible, more illible than the grocers and taxi drivers to hom Laura talked. All that the intellec-ıals said did not keep them from being fools ıemselves, and no good would come of it.

Over Henry's breakfast tables Laura had eard the inside story that Hitler would not cupy Czechoslovakia, Russia would not ıst six weeks, and Japan would never dare ttack this country. And the men who had ıade these predictions suffered no loss of restige when the pre-ictions proved to be ılse.

This morning they ad all seemed like a lot f heads, with clatter-ıg voice boxes, sup-orted by no flesh and one. And especially y no heart. If she had ot left the table, she ight have told them o, and Henry would ave said she was not ell, which was true. She was not well. Henry said it was be-ause she missed the children, but she had ecided that it was because she was sur-ounded by people who were never simple, atural, serene. The children's going away ad simply brought her face to face with the ruth that her heart was starving to death.

Woman, why weepest thou? She saith unto hem, Because they have taken away my Lord, nd I know not where they have laid him.

She had become one of those women who aunt doctors' offices when there isn't a thing n the world the matter except everything in he world. She felt guilty. She had so many lessings. A home and a husband. Two grown hildren. Money. She was even a little bit ood-looking. She had got a habit of squint-ng her eyes when she looked into mirrors, ut she was sure—almost sure—someone ight think she was attractive.

SHE never told Henry how she felt. No nan wanted to hear a list of symptoms that ame and went, grew better and grew worse. So she always said, "I'm just fine, Henry." She had developed little ways of appearing ust fine. But she was getting no better. Sometimes she felt as if she were outside the vorld, trying to get in, but the surface was lippery and her fingers were losing their ıold. She might slide out into space. Here, ıs she sat in this pew, she was outside, and he singing and the speaking were inside, where she could not reach them. Why had she come here? She couldn't say. It was—t was just somewhere to go.

I believe in God, the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth.

The last hymn before the sermon had been sung. The choir settled, rustling, into the stalls. The congregation had stopped cough-ng. And now, in the sighing silence, Dr. Job Tatum rose to deliver his Easter sermon. There were more than a thousand faces, lifted, waiting to hear him. In a steady voice he read his text: "I am the Resurrection and the Life."

He did not believe a word of what he was saying.

THEY screamed questions at her through the little round hole in the glass. They had to scream, on account of the trains' roaring. But it always surprised Gladys when they opened their mouths so wide, because, to her, the trains made no noise.

It was four o'clock in the afternoon and she was thinking about yesterday and the Easter service. There was a sharp rap on the glass. She looked down at the arch and there was nobody's hand. So she looked up at the hole and there was somebody's eyes staring straight at her. Jake! She thought she was going to faint, but she ran out of the cage and he took her in his arms.

"I thought you was in camp! Why didn't you let me know? I could of ——"

"There wasn't no way to let you know, kid," he told her. "We're pushing off. Kinda soon, I guess. I ain't supposed to say even that much. But—I got a twenty-four-hour pass."

"But, Jake—that means we've only got till tomorrow noon! We haven't got even that much. I can't leave here till another four hours. And we was going to be married."

"I feel like I'm going nuts."

"Look, Jake. We got sixteen hours." She put her hand on his shoulder. "We won't let nothing spoil that. You're here and ——"

"Yeah. But we can't get married."

"When you get back ——"

"If I get back!"

There were customers at the window. The rush was starting and she had to leave him. And after a while Jake went away. Just before eight he was back with a bunch of sweet peas. And smiling, like he'd made up his mind he wouldn't spoil what time they had. But Mrs. Kraken, who was supposed to relieve Gladys at eight, didn't show up for twenty minutes. She was so sorry over being late that she gave them a whole pound box of chocolates she had bought for herself.

When they got upstairs it was real dark. Jake wanted to eat, but Gladys said, "I got to go change my clothes, Jake. I got to. We won't be togethér for a long while, Jake. I want to put on my pink dress so's you can remember me in it. The one you said went so good with my hair."

He sat down in the parlor at Mrs. Mitrou's while she changed as fast as she could. Mrs. Mitrou watched from out in the hall to see that Jake didn't try to go upstairs. She looked disappointed when Gladys came down in her pink dress, with the sweet peas pinned on, and her new black patent-leather pumps.

They had supper in an Italian restaurant, but it didn't taste good. They didn't talk much because what they were thinking about was things they couldn't say. Then they went to the movies and had to stand in line for seats, but finally they were up in the balcony, with Jake's arm around her, and her head on his shoulder.

Afterward they walked along Broadway, bumping against a lot of other guys and girls who had nowhere to go. Gladys' face ached from smiling. By now the new pumps were hurting something terrible, and the pain in her feet and the pain over Jake's going away were all mixed up together.

"Let's go to Central Park, Jake. We can sit down in the park."

"It's sorta funny. If you wanta hate anybody, there's plenty of places. They spend lotsa dough on you so you can go kill guys.

But if you love anybody—you ain't got nowheres."

"I never thought of things like that."

"A guy gets to thinking in the Army."

Anyhow, it was quiet in the park. When they found an empty bench, Gladys slipped off her pumps and they looked up at the sky around the park and it was all full of little square lights, the windows of people who had places to go.

"I been thinking, Jake. People like us, we don't get nothing that's as good as what other people have. But if we could of had a baby—that would of been something that only you and me could of had. Nobody with a billion dollars could of had our baby. Nobody but us. Sometimes I get to wondering. Where's our baby now? I mean—is he out in the air somewheres, waiting for us to have him? Is he alive already? You know—there's been nights when I thought I heard him crying."

"The world is full of people with plenty of chance to have babies. But you and me ——"

It started raining. They went to Grand Central Station and found a seat in a corner. They ate the chocolates and talked about running their own gas station. . . . When dawn came through the great windows they were asleep, heads bowed, borne away in their dreams to a place where people who loved were welcome.

"We are certain the sun will rise tomorrow morning. But actually there is no such thing as certainty. Our certainties are merely faiths that, as far as we can discover, have always worked. What we know and what we do not know are identical. Faith is all we have, and the known and the unknown are simply its varying degrees."

Dr. Job Tatum's study was paneled in dark wood, and, between the panels, tapestries of books reached to the ceiling. Job Tatum's desk stood before a stained-glass window that represented the miracle of water into wine. Facing the window was a wide chair with pale soft upholstery, ready for anyone who had made an appointment weeks in advance.

Job Tatum sat with his back to the window. All last night he had walked up and down in his bedroom. He could not remember what he had said, yesterday, after he had given out the text and known, suddenly, with a giddy sensation of falling through darkness, that he did not believe. But what he could remember, and what filled him with a special sort of humiliation, was that he had preached well.

He had always thought himself a man to whose words sincerity gave a special power. "Truth is power," he had often said. And that must be a lie. Evidently he had learned his tricks of voice and gesture so well that he could be eloquently and powerfully false. Over the years he must have become more skillful in his spiritual habits, but lived by less and less spiritual light, until, now, the last spark had gone out.

This was darkness. This was no quick stab of doubt which every minister had. Such moods were bad enough. A doubting minister could do nothing but wait and pray to the God he doubted until his faith was with him again, come as mysteriously as it had gone, like a wind, like a mood. But this was no mood. This morning, as he walked through the church, the altar had looked unfamiliar. And now the study was strange. The Madonna and the cross on his desk might as well have been fetishes set here by some savage.

How poor a thing his belief must have been, if it could crumble so imperceptibly until, on Easter morning, he could say in his heart there was no God. Perhaps if he thought back to the reasons why, in his youth, he had believed, the same reasons would make him believe again.

He did not want to remember, because he had never forgiven his childhood. The only loving thing he could remember about it was once when his father, a little while before he died, had held a handkerchief in the air, made a gesture, and suddenly there was a bright little pot of flowers. He wished his father had not shown him how the trick was one because it was better to believe that, ll of a sudden in the air, there could be a pot f flowers. But his father had shown him ther tricks; some of them he could still do.

The night his mother died, when he was six, e had run out of the ugly flat into South Bleecker Street and sat on the curb and obbed. Because a neighbor had said the po- ce would take him to an orphans' home. outh Bleecker Street children dreaded being ent to a home. They said you ate bread and vater there and marched in lockstep. So Job ad sat on the curb in the dark until he felt a and on his shoulder, steady and gentle. And e had looked up to see a woman's face. He ad often thought, in these many years since, hat it was the face of God, in a blue-and- ed Salvation Army bonnet. And that God ad stooped down and taken his hand.

The woman took him back to headquar- ers; he was bathed and fed, given a place to leep. All the faces and voices were kind. He earned to stop shrinking back and covering p his head when anybody spoke to him. And resently they told him that a young man rom uptown had seen him standing on a hair, helping with the dishes, and had offered o pay his way through boarding school. And e must never know who the man was.

In vacations he lived with the Army, earn- ng his board, when he grew older, at odd obs in stores and at the docks. When he sked the Army people why they spent their ives helping others, they said it was the will f God. It was only atural for him to want to devote his ife to this God. And o he went to theo- ogical seminary, nd his faith was uilt on gratitude.

Of course, his aith had broadened nd deepened. How ervent he had been bout his first coun- ry parish! How umble he had felt when he met Ann here and knew she oved him! They had known three adiant years. And hen their girl child had died when she was two months old. Ann had clung to him and said a line from one of the poets she loved: "Not as a child shall we behold her, but as a daughter in her Father's house." Ann came down with pneumonia, and pneumonia killed fast in those days. Even then he had not lost his faith. Instead, it seemed as if, in his grief, he had come closer to understanding God.

Ann had never seemed dead till this morning. Now, suddenly, he had a feeling that never again would he imagine she was alive.

MISS GROOBY came into his study. For a wry moment, he wondered if he had lost his faith on account of Miss Grooby. She was not only talkative but pious; and, if you are a minister, talkative piety is almost intolerable. Job had sometimes dreamed of having a secretary who was a taciturn agnostic. But, as Miss Grooby would have put it, that was Not Meant To Be. It was his destiny to be greeted, in fair weather, by Miss Grooby saying, "Isn't it a lovely morning? We must thank our Heavenly Father for it." If it sleeted and froze, she still indefatigably thanked our Heavenly Father that it was no worse.

But she was efficient. She was careful, for instance, to keep people from him who might "take his strength"—the drunks, panhandlers, neurotics, would-be suicides, even the duller members of St. Simon's. There must be a visitor of whom she approved this morning, since she had appeared without being sent for.

"Mr. Romney to see you—the Mr. Romney. The actor."

Job was relieved that his visitor was not a church member. "Have him come in."

Nick Romney took the chair that faced the water-into-wine window. He had the absorbed look of a troubled man.

"Glad to know you, Mr. Romney. I saw you in the play about the magician."

"Do me a favor. Call me Nick."

"Short for Nicodemus?"

"Nathaniel."

Job looked at him inquiringly. Obviously he had not come here to confess a sin. And yet Nick Romney was afraid.

"I'VE got the lead in a play that's being produced this fall," he said. "A Protestant minister. Now don't get me wrong. My minister is a good scout."

"Congratulations. Protestant ministers on the stage are usually depressing."

"It's like this," Nick went on awkwardly. "I've got this part and I've—well, I've never given much thought to religion. I guess that must seem shocking to you, but ——"

Job shook his head. No one in that chair could shock him after all these years, although they always thought they could. People had all committed very much the same sins and asked very much the same questions. And Job had all the answers at his tongue's end, the beautiful language of the Bible and the ritual, that seemed so brilliant in contrast to the fumbling words of those who asked the questions. But Job hoped that Romney would not ask questions, because, this morning, his throat thickened at the thought of beautiful language.

"Playing a role is more than getting the lines. That's been said by a lot of hams, but it's true. I've got to—have the feel of things. I picked you because I've always heard you not only put on a good show, but you believe what you're saying."

Suppose, Job thought, he should tell this man he did not believe? No. He might be mistaken in his unbelief; he hoped to God—well, he hoped he was mistaken. "Tell me about the play."

"Well, it takes place on a station platform over in New Jersey. It's time for a commuting train, so there's all kinds of people on the platform, and they all have their problems. There's a minister too. And he has everybody's troubles on his mind. So—well, the play has fantasy in it. The minister tells the people they don't have to take the train for Hoboken. There's one that's going to heaven, and they can get on that. Everybody thinks that's wonderful. But then the minister says this train is going to only one heaven, and they've got to decide what heaven they want. So everybody—it's done by blackouts—tells his idea of heaven. And then they all get to fighting because nobody likes anybody else's idea. It's really much better than it sounds."

"It sounds important."

"That's just it." Nick's voice was eager. "The idea sort of gets you. Especially now. It's a big chance for me if—if you'd let me talk to you now and then. I don't even know what religion is all about."

Job said, "I think you should get some idea of what it's all about. That would give you what you call the 'feel' of things. I suggest you read the New Testament. As you would read any book. For the picture it gives you." He went over to a bookcase. "Take this one."

"If I could come back—after I've read it?"

"Of course. Some of us who have been close to the New Testament for a long while are apt to lose our perspective. But here you are, meeting it for the first time. I'll look forward to hearing what it does to you."

When Nick had gone, Job sat staring at the gold cross. Then he moved it out of his line of vision. But he kept seeing it. He could not escape from it, nor from the Madonna. Nor the books on the shelves. He was a man surrounded by the belongings of a dead love. It was like that time when, everywhere he looked, he could see Ann's gloves, although he had locked them away. He buzzed for Miss Grooby.

"I'm going away for a week," he said. "A week in Vermont. Have Mellon take the Sunday-morning service and ——"

"You're exhausted," Miss Grooby said earnestly. "I said to the sexton only this morning, I said, 'If only Doctor Tatum would go away for a week, it would be a direct answer to prayer.' God moves in a mysterious way. There isn't anybody prominent in the church who's sick. You can go away with a free mind and lift up your eyes to the hills from whence cometh our strength."

"I got a letter from a girl," the soldier said in the foxhole. "She says she's trying to kill time. Makes my blood run cold. Time is all we've got. Why, if I just knew I had time ——"

They were in the dusky light of La Belle Fleur. In a corner booth, where no one could see them. It was Easter Monday at the cocktail hour. Laura was wearing the hat with the wreath of blush roses and her dress matched the wreath. This was one of the days when she felt well. Barry had made love to her, off and on, for a quarter of a century. It was soothing to hear him say pleasant things about her dress and her hat.

"It's been five years," Barry said. "Do you know what I thought when I saw you come in?"

"I want to know." Her head tilted a little to the side, as it used to tilt when she was a girl.

"You are not reconciled to life. Since I've been back, so many faces look smug. But, thank God, you're not satisfied."

She thought triumphantly of what Betsy would say if she could see her mother now, Betsy who thought she was ready to drop into her grave. And Henry too.

"And no wonder! The people you go around with! How on earth do you stand them? Did you ever see any of them do anything except talk and talk and talk? They don't believe in anything, so they don't live for anything. That isn't good enough for you, Laura. You want more than that. You need—love."

She sighed. For a moment she had thought he might be going to say something important. But it was the old game. However, she could play that game, in the hat with the wreath of roses.

"I need everything," she said.

He leaned closer. "Look, my dear. Every time we meet you're more beautiful. But you're dead. What you need is someone to make you come alive again. To take you in his arms and make you feel like a million dollars not giving a damn."

His tone and manner were perfect. Men had learned a lot from the radio and movies. Their technique had definitely improved. Or was she getting more susceptible?

"I've got plans for you and me," he said. "Are you tempted?"

"Perhaps."

"Here are my plans. I'll take you in my arms and kiss you until you are blind and deaf and dumb. And then ——"

She looked down at the orange slice and cherry in her glass. So many women of her age, who had begun to wonder what life was all about, solved things with a man like Barry. Using sex like drink or dope or a good osteopath. But she had always hoped there might be, up ahead in the years, a sort radiance. And she had not meant, by that, other man.

She foresaw her future with Barry: the ispers, the expectation, the illusion of owing and being known, the giving and taking. . . . But she had been through that. And she was not stupid enough to nk Barry could introduce any variation. y affair in middle age was a going back- rd, a return to adolescence, and without physical equipment of adolescence, or its ility not to foresee.

He was angry, but trying not to show it. Of course. You might try collecting stamps old china."

It was spring outdoors, and it had seemed spring in this little booth, with the pale ors and the sparkle and the music. And w, at Barry's words, spring dimmed and nished. And she sat here, letting it vanish, d she felt as if she could not bear it. And n, suddenly, Barry kissed her. Holding close, tipping her head back, unsettling hat.

"Barry," she said shakily, "I had for- ten. I had forgotten what it was like."

He was juggling oranges, tossing them up with left hand, catching them with his right, cas- ly, in exact rhythm. I have wasted my life, he s thinking. Now that vaudeville is dead, who es about jugglers? Why did I take the trouble earn, when there is nobody to look?

A man left a haunted house. By any door. thout stopping to think whether it was best door. So had Job Tatum come to s Vermont lake surrounded by dark hills d vineyards. Instinctively he had wanted take refuge here, where Ann and he had nt their honeymoon, where life had been flood tide, and it was easy to see God. It had been early September then. Ann d called it a benignant season, Ann gather- heavy blue grapes in a basket, Ann run- g lightly under the trees, the red leaves ling on her sunny hair. Ann had always nted to go back, but another visit was too pensive. It was heartbreaking to remem- that any delight had been too expensive Ann. He and she had both been deceived that false spacious sky that said, "Plenty time. . . . Plenty of time."

He did not recognize the lake. This steel- ored Vermont April was not at all like at blue benignant September. The water s gray, the trees bare and the grapevines isted skeletons. The cottage where Ann d he had stayed had burned down. Job k a room at the Bassett house, which had ign saying TOURISTS.

All the first day he stayed in his room, king out at the rain, the streaming trees, the church spire on the hill and, beneath his window, the wet blur of grass and lilac buds. He was as caged here as he had been in his study. He really should have gone South to some fecund place which burst with leaves and flowers. If there were a God, He was to be found in the midst of abundance. Man, in his darkest moments, had never imagined a frugal God.

NEXT day the weather was mild. Job walked up the hill and sat on a dry sunny stone. Over his head were the pregnant branches of an apple tree. He had often, with Ann, looked through branches to the sky, staring until Ann and he and the branches and the sky were one. But now he saw only remote sky and disinterested buds. He leaned over and rapped his knuckles against the ground. It was hollow. Under its ordered crust, the universe was vacant. It had no purpose that concerned the heart of man. This was its guilty secret.

According to popular notion, atheists were gay and lusty. They had gusto, and believers had gloom. But Job had never met any happy atheists. All those he had known were haunting the offices of doctors and psychiatrists, falling apart inside. Those who portrayed the gusto of unbelievers simply did not know life. Their world was the banal fantasy of the loaf of bread, the jug of wine, and the wench beside them singing in the wilderness. It sounded fine. But life did not work out that way. Wind and sun and eating and drinking and wenching were not enough for the suffering of the world, the failures, the lonely, the bereft.

Be frank, Job Tatum. You are miserable because, if you continue to have no faith, you must give up your pulpit. You would find it unpleasant to stop being the famous Job Tatum and be nobody at all in some new line of work. Moreover, you must break yourself of so many habits of thought. Even now, you find your mind snagging on some of the old phrases: "Let not your heart be troubled." . . . "Lo, I am with you alway." For these phrases, blanks must be substituted. And you must learn to remember Ann as the aimless functioning of a mechanism whose flywheel was the belief that it was not a mechanism. Or why remember at all the face of nobody who was nowhere? You must get used to it. You might, in time, even adopt the philosophy of eat, drink and be merry. But you did not think so. You could eat and drink, but not be merry. If your fellow men suffered, hoped and sacrificed, and at last went into the ground, prayed over by those who were either hypocritical or mistaken, mourned by dupes or cowards, there was nothing merry on this earth.

Tramping the hills, in a daze of thoughts that circled endlessly back to the place where they began, Job spent that black week at the Bassetts'. On Sunday Mrs. Bassett asked him to go to church, but he refused. On Monday, after lunch he borrowed Mr. Bassett's fishing tackle and rowboat. He rowed a mile to a cove that Mr. Bassett recommended. The water was molten silver tipped with molten gold. He let his line down.

For an hour nothing happened. Only the light wind blew, and the boat turned round the anchor, and the sun lowered. No wonder Christ had chosen fishermen for His disciples. They were by nature hopeful and patient. It was irritating to have such a thought come now, when he had almost forgotten his torment. "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men."

He let down his line on the other side. The fish struck. Hard. It swam with the line; it rushed toward the boat; it leaped with white spray out of the gold-and-silver water. For twenty minutes, Job was released from thought of everything except the line singing on the rod, the tightening reel, winding his quarry in, little by exultant little, until finally it came over the side of the boat.

It was a small-mouth black bass. It lay in the bottom of the boat, fins spread, scales shining, mouth wide, tail thumping, flat bright eyes eager for life. Mindless, beautiful, drowning in air, its amoral life force was gathered into an instinctive rage against death. Job gently unsnagged the hook from the desperate gaping mouth.

"If I believed in God," he said, "I would have Mrs. Bassett cook you for supper. But now that I believe nothing, and this flicker of life is all we have, I will throw you back into the lake. Swim. Comb the water through your gills. Eat, drink and be merry."

Ever since Jake went away, Gladys and Mr. Omar had gone somewhere every Saturday night. He said it was his way of keeping an eye on her like Jake told him to. This Saturday they were in Madison Square Garden at the circus. It was just wonderful. There was so much to see that she didn't know where to look, and, just for a minute, her heart stopped hurting for Jake's danger.

"I can't thank you enough, Mr. Omar. If it wasn't for you, I guess I wouldn't go anywheres except to church on Sundays."

"Never been to a church. But I heard plenty. If you want to go to church, okay, but don't take it too serious."

"But, Mr. Omar, aren't people supposed to take church serious?"

"It ain't sensible. They tell you in church that God loves you. Now you got to take that with a pinch of salt. Suppose you was starving to death. Would God reach down out of the sky and say, 'Kid, here's a half a buck; go stuff yourself'? Would He?"

"Maybe God don't reach half a buck out of the sky, but he answers prayers. Why, there's a window in the church that says ASK AND YE SHALL RECEIVE. So I figure, if I pray, Jake'll be safe."

"If praying does you any good, go ahead. But why do you have to pray in a church? Why couldn't you do it right in your own room."

"Look, Mr. Omar. The printed thing they give you at church says, 'This is God's house.' I figure maybe God has His ear cocked special toward His own house."

"Say, I wish I had that trick dog. My boy Leon is crazy for dogs. Now they tell you God loves you. Well, then, why do you have to pray to Him to keep Jake safe? Why wouldn't He do it anyhow? I'm just your friend, but if I could do it I'd keep Jake safe for you and you wouldn't have to ask me and you wouldn't have to thank me afterwards neither."

"You don't understand. Maybe if I didn't pray, God would think, 'Now there's that guy, Jake Malone. Nobody gives a darn for Jake and somebody's got to get killed so it might as well be him.' But when God hears me praying, He says to Himself, 'There's somebody wants Jake. I'll keep an eye on Jake. It's a good thing Gladys reminded me.' You see, Mr. Omar, there's some things you just don't understand."

Away from La Belle Fleur she had managed to see, once and for all, that Barry was not what she wanted. But one thing Barry had said was true. She was dead, and she must rise from the dead. Must rise from this white sofa in the room with the zebra rugs, and get back into the world of the living.

Ever since Easter she had thought of religion. She was that desperate. How many times she had pitied middle-aged women, without the opportunity for sex or the money for doctors, who had tried religion's obscure brands! They went up rickety stairs, sat in stuffy rooms, listened to men with turbans on their heads or women dressed in beads and scarfs. Aghast at the naïveté of a Christian heaven, they put their trust in the transmigration of souls, and said they had once been Egyptian slaves. And the conviction that she had been an Egyptian slave never seemed to console any woman for longer than six weeks.

Suppose she tried religion? Well, she would certainly choose a kind that lasted longer. Oh, stuff and nonsense! But she had tried all the sensible things. Why not try stuff and nonsense? It might be—an adventure. But of course she didn't have the right spirit. She would never get anywhere, just experimenting with some vague God as an adventure, and thinking underneath, It might all be fiddlesticks. She had no trust, no humility, none of the virtues that God seemed to admire. All she possessed was her need.

In the late afternoon, a pale light was flickering into Melita's bedroom over the boxes of blue hyacinths on the balcony outside the windows. This room was done as Melita wanted, but she was forever dressing to get away from it. On the stool that looked like a high blue mushroom, she was brushing her black hair, looking into the mirror with those white-lidded narrow silver eyes. She was going out to have cocktails with Ben Bliss. He not only was producing Nick's show this fall, but the musical in which Melita would soon be the star ballerina. It was only natural that she go out with Bliss.

And yet Nick wanted to say, "Don't go, Melita." He knew that she was not in love with Bliss. But he also knew that behind this meeting there was some purpose which should disturb him. And it was not any physical infidelity. Melita, having clawed her way to the top from the wrong side of the railroad tracks, was not the sort to take chances with an affair. She liked, at long last, being respectable.

But this was no comfort. Melita was planning to betray him in a fashion which would go deeper than any bodily disloyalty. She had a subtle unfaithful air as she laid down the brush, shrugged into a white dressing gown, lifting her cloud of curls over its collar.

She must not know how closely he was watching. He was anxious for her to believe he was wrapped up in this new part which would make her, once more, the wife of Broadway success. So he had brought th New Testament into the bedroom and he s in the blue slipper chair as if he were sorbed in the book and was here only becau this light was good.

"This is a very interesting book, Melit Even if I didn't have to read it for my pa I'd be interested. The man in here—yo can't help but like him. He never sai 'What's in it for me?' You can't figure out man like that."

"He wouldn't get very far these days."

"I don't wonder that people followed hi around. Suppose a man like him had put h hands on my father's eyes and made him s again? Why, I'd have followed him an where."

"This is definitely not my day." She fi gered the perfume bottles. "I'm all out Intoxication. Well, that's life for you."

"He said something I can't understan I mean when he healed people. He sai 'Thy faith hath made thee whole.' I don get it. But I have a feeling that it's sort of key to the whole thing."

She was slipping into a thin black dres Carefully, so as not to disturb her hair. H knew she was not listening, but he kept o talking, because a silence, just as she wa about to go, seemed so sinister. His voic because he was not saying what he wanted t say, was pitched higher than normal. It wa a voice he would use on the stage if he we playing the part of an old man. His blin father had sounded like that when his moth had come to the door before she went out t a party. And his father had always said, "A you wearing the blue dress, Flora?"

Melita had perched a cluster of cherries o top of her head and slid a bag under her arm "Poor Nick. Reading that old book!"

She was gone. When he went to the ba cony and looked down she was standing o the curb, far below, while the doorman foun her a taxi.

If the devil should come along right no Nick thought, and tell me to cast myself fro this window and promise me that it would ma Melita love me all our lives—I'd do it. I ju wish I had the chance. I'd do it.

He looked at the empty mirror, listened t the empty room. "Fool," he said bitterl "Fool." And he did not know whether h was speaking to himself or to the man in th book.

REMOVE snow and slush promptly before it becomes packed or frozen, advises the National Safety Council. If ice has already formed and cannot be cleared, sprinkle it with salt, sand, ashes, fine cinders—or mix the salt with any of these gritty materials.

Icy Steps are Especially Dangerous

Icicles which hang from the roof above entrances should be removed so that they do not fall on the heads of unsuspecting guests or fall and cause puddles which freeze into icy spots where accidents may happen.

Two strips of strong adhesive tape placed to form a cross on the soles of rubbers or galoshes will make them more skidproof. This is particularly important this year, since most rubbers and galoshes are worn smooth and new ones are scarce.

An indication of the seriousness of the ice problem was a report last winter that 100 members of the police force of Chicago were disabled from falls on ice during one month.

It was absurd to think, this early, about tudying your part. It was only the first of une, and rehearsals would not start until ctober. But you were like a man too long way from a devoted wife.

You tried to memorize just one scene. You hose the speech where you quote from the ermon on the Mount. But you could not arn it. You had no memory at all. You got ust so far and then your mind was suddenly tuffed tight with gray wool. And then you ooked at the script and wondered how you ould have forgotten, because the words ere not difficult at all:

"And he opened his mouth, and taught hem, saying, 'Blessed are the poor in pirit: for their's is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are they that mourn ——'"

There the blank came. Why should you ail in just that place? Of course you did not elieve that those who mourned were lessed. Who wanted to mourn? Perhaps ou forgot those lines because you thought hey were not true. But all your life you had aid, and very glibly, lines in which you did ot believe. Why, now, should you stumble?

You tried analyzing these lines because, if ou understood them, you might remember. But the Nazarene was a mysterious fellow. ometimes he sounded so wise that you aught your breath and sometimes he ounded foolish. Could he have been both ise and foolish? That didn't seem possible.

Comforted. How? If you went to Melita nd told her that you could not remember our lines, she would not say the right hings. You had always known there was no omfort of that kind in Melita. But perhaps ou were wrong; you had never given her a hance.

You ought not to disturb Melita at a re- earsal. But there was no one else. If a man ouldn't go to his wife when he was in rouble, where could he go? You went out. A taxi bore you through the blue night air of he park toward the spangled windows of hose who mourned or did not mourn, rising ier on tier into the night.

You were in the wings. Melita was re- earsing the white ballet. The floor of the tage was a mirror, so that every dancer was wo dancers, joined together lightly at the oes. In the wings opposite, you noticed Don Bellamy, the handsome young man who had the role of the mayor in your play. Whom did Don Bellamy know here?

Melita was twirling on her toes, the ice-white dress fluttering and foaming, drifting like a feather. As she turned, you saw her face, and your heart bounded. Why, you had been wrong about Melita. She had the comfort you needed. The other dancers gathered about her, like the petals of a white peony, and she was lifted up, in her most radiant pose, her face, secret and tender, the face of a woman in love.

"Okay," someone shouted. The radiance stopped in midair. The mirror was dull. A dancer was no longer two dancers. Melita began walking toward the opposite wings.

"Melita," you called, and she turned, startled. All the tender promise in her face was gone. She only looked very tired. Your heart dropped like a stone.

"Nick," she said. "Why are you here?"

"Blessed are they that mourn," you said, dazed and stupid. "It's a line in my play. I can't remember the next line. Can you help me remember?"

"Are you crazy? How should I know?"

"If you loved me, Melita, perhaps I could remember."

"You are talking nonsense," she said. And she was right.

"You must be baptized," Reverend Primrose said. He looked more like a football player than a minister. His hair was a stiff sandy brush all over his head, and he had freckles. It didn't seem right for a minister to have freckles.

"But—I thought baptizing was just something they did to babies."

"Everyone must be baptized before becoming a church member."

"I'd just as soon."

"Just why do you want to join the church, Miss Foster?"

"Do I—do I have to say why?"

"But surely you must have a reason."

She told him about Jake, and that was no lie, because she wanted to get affiliated not just on account of a funeral, but on account of Jake too. Reverend Primrose smiled, and when he smiled he looked real human. She wasn't afraid to ask him, now, the question that was on her mind.

"I don't mean anything disrespectful. But—how does God love us? Like—like I love Jake?"

"God loves us like a father."

"My father drank."

"That's the fault of our social order." He looked at his wrist watch. "I wish I could talk longer, Miss Foster. But I have other calls to make. Come to my office at the church next Sunday at half past ten. I'll baptize you, and then you can join the church at the morning service."

He didn't sound at all sacred. It was like making a date for a permanent. "I sort of expected you would ask me some questions. Like am I going to lead a better life or ——"

"I don't need to ask you any questions," he said. And then, just for a minute, he did sound sacred. "I know you're going to lead a better life."

The floor show was on at the Golden Galleon. The music was loud and the girls were kicking up their heels to the stars painted on the ceiling. "I want to forget," the man muttered into his glass. "I'll sit here and pay a hundred bucks to forget. Then I'll go out of here and remember."

Job Tatum, in the wing chair by the hearth, looked over at Mr. and Mrs. Briggs on the wide velvet sofa. This dinner had been exactly like all the others in the twenty years since he had baptized their boy in his christening robe on the satin pillow.

Mr. Briggs was smoking the right kind of cigar. Mrs. Briggs, with gold-tipped needles, was turning the heel of an Army sock. These were the chief pillars of his church. Without the Briggses and a few others like them, St. Simon's could not function. Year after year, they gave generously. Nor did they, like so many pillars, attempt to dictate church policy. Of course the policy of St. Simon's had never run counter to their wishes, but that, perhaps, was only a coincidence.

Since his return from the lake, Job had gone about his work almost as usual. It had been fairly easy to busy himself with the details of organization work and committees. Other ministers, he felt, must have concealed the emptiness of their spirits in this way, till finally they had forgotten what faith was like, as a person long ill may forget what health is like. Or they kept crusading for enlightened government, world cooperation. Faith in world objectives was easier than what some of the modern clergy called "the mystical side" of religion.

But Job was not made of the stuff of compromise. He was determined to leave his pulpit unless he could believe. Every day, every hour he was consciously or unconsciously searching for a way to believe. That was why he had accepted the Briggses' invitation. They were "good people." They had a "Christian home." Perhaps if he turned the after-dinner talk that way, they might tell him why they had faith. Their only son had been killed in action. Next Sunday they had sat, as usual, in their pew.

Job might find a way to believe if they would only say how, in the test, God had stood by them.

And yet, they seemed so untouched. Of course there were little differences. Once, during dinner, Mrs. Briggs had said, "My son," and stopped, and time had seemed to stop with her. Then she had hurried on to say something about their victory garden on the terrace. What Job had noticed most was what the Briggses did not say. What they did say was the same: Mrs. Briggs apologizing for the way dinner had been served and Mr. Briggs discussing, with a wry amusement, the problems of a businessman at the mercy of politicians in a world made imbecile by war. Tonight he turned to prophecy:

"Between you and me, all this talk about a better postwar world is just the stuff they feed the troops. When we get the dust out of our eyes, this earth will be pretty much the same old place it's always been."

Job knew that he should not say what he was going to say, but if he were going to get any help, he must reach beneath the surface. "What did your son think about it?"

"Guess he never got around to thinking very much," Mr. Briggs said gruffly. "After all, he was only nineteen. How about some brandy?"

"I did so enjoy your sermon last Sunday," Mrs. Briggs said hurriedly.

. . . And, lo, thou art unto them as a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well on an instrument.

At last he was away from them, in the open air, breathing it deep, wishing he could smash his fist into the teeth of conventional morality—the earth-born and shrewd and sterile thing that people like the Briggses lived by, that Job Tatum, unless he found his faith again, must substitute for religion, heaven-born and fecund. And he always had known and always would know, in or out of St. Simon's, that man could not live by morality alone. Her breasts were shriveled. Her loins were dry. He could see himself, in the years to come. Godless but moral. Arid but law-abiding. A man who might believe in love, but who, since his love died, had been alone.

It was the fifth of June. Tomorrow was her wedding day. She leaned out of her window and looked at the approving stars, and the silver flowers smiling in their sleep. "Such a wonderful night," she said. "Such a peaceful night. Everybody asleep but God and the milkman and me. Thank you, fifth of June, for being so quiet and so beautiful."

Job wakened with a start. And yet there had been no noise. But there was a loud sound in his mind. He turned the knob of his bedside radio.

"American troops have landed in France."

This was the hour. The long waiting had ended. Here was an exultation that, a year ago, would have made him turn to his God and pray, "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done." But now —— At this moment, men were dying. And, since there was no God, in death men became nothing.

He tried to imagine nothing. He could not, because there was no nothing in Nature. Even the black space between the stars was not empty. And how strange that death, which seemed so natural, should be this unnatural nothing.

"—— casualties so far are light ——"

No casualty was light. Not when it struck home. Job had always thought, since he was too old to be a chaplain, that his work would be to comfort his people not only for the death of those they loved, but for the sense of weariness and doom which war brought even to the victorious. But now he was useless. The hour had come, and he had nothing to give. He prayed. It was difficult to break this habit. He prayed, "Lord, let me die, and let a man with faith be saved to comfort Thy people."

Next morning in the church study he kept the radio turned low. Miss Grooby said she thought the invasion showed God was in His heaven and all was right with the world. But had Doctor Tatum forgotten about looking in on the convention of Sunday-school teachers this morning?

Around eleven Job looked in. The teachers were seated in earnest rows. They all were trained in "religious education." The church had gone a long distance from the days when any old maid could teach Sunday school and say anything she pleased.

A superintendent from Passaic was speaking on Social Attitudes. The child, he said, must not be taught insecurity; there was some doubt as to the value of the old song, Jesus Loves Me, because the line, "I am weak but He is strong," might lead to an inferiority complex.

Job knew that these workers were far better equipped than the Salvation Army woman who had given him, at the age of seven, a gaudy chromo of Christ, with the words "All we like sheep have gone astray." And yet, there was something missing at this meeting.

At two o'clock, Mellon came to the study. A minister could not be too particular these days about his assistants. Yet every time Job heard Mellon's voice he wanted to grind his got rich expensive silence. And Job had grown to like silence. The constant noises twisted his nerves. Why did he have to hear, to know, to share, to get involved? Why could he not find his faith in silence, in a cool, clean, sweet-smelling place, by tumbling green sea water or on a high mountain trail? If there was a God, He liked silence. On the seventh day He rested and took His ease in the silent spaces between the stars.

It was cooler when night came, but he did not like the dark. He seemed to stop being Job Tatum and be that child again as he felt himself falling asleep. He woke about two in the morning, his heart pounding. He was lying, as he had used to lie as a child, facing the door, listening for his mother's steps on the stairs, wanting and yet not wanting to hear. Ice cold in the heat, he turned on the light, and was reassured by the sight of his middle-aged body. But, for a while, he could not think the thoughts of a middle-aged man, the minister of St. Simon's. He kept the light on until he stopped being a child. And he heard all the night noises: outside, the fire truck, the police car speeding; inside, the sighing—yes, under it all, there was a strange sort of sighing—as there had been, on Easter morning, at St. Simon's.

At five o'clock he went to an all-night restaurant where he had eggs and coffee. The cash register, the dishes, the tinware jangled, clattered and crashed.

"Kinda quiet, ain't it?" somebody said. "Let's put a nickel in the juke box. I get the creeps when it's so quiet."

He was at the dock at six, showing the button on his shirt. He stood with a group of other workmen, self-conscious because his cap and overalls were new, shoving his white hands deep in his pockets. The early climbing sun reddened the mist on the river; it would be another scorching day. "Hey there, get a move on," the foreman called, and Job and another man started rolling a heavy drum.

But Job still did not feel of the people. He felt exactly as he had on the morning when he took Holy Orders.

SHE had been trying now, every day for a month, to think about God. But nothing had happened. She thought and thought, and that was the end of it. She had even hunted up an old Bible, and read it, here and there, but it had no meaning for her. After years of neglecting God, she could not expect —— Yet God was everywhere. Even in her failure to find Him. God was love.

Whenever she thought of love, she thought of Betsy. Not of Betsy as she was now, tall, slim, adult, married, a separate human being wanting very much to be separate. Another Betsy, a child of seven, with wide serious brown eyes and long straight hair falling around her shoulders, a pudgy Betsy, whom one could love almost as much as one wanted.

God is a spirit, and they that worship Him ——

Henry had always been afraid she would ruin the children by loving them too much. Henry had been the victim of a doting possessive mother. He had sent Ted, very young, to a boarding school, and, after that, Ted had belonged to his school and was never part of the country house where Henry and Betsy and she lived. But Henry had seen no harm in her keeping Betsy at home. And so the love of which Henry was afraid had flourished. It was like the little milk jug in the fable. The more you poured out, the more bubbled up from its secret source.

Betsy was seven when Poos came to the house. Poos was a tiger kitten. "A real tiger," Betsy had said, her eyes bright and proud, as if all the other children were being deceived by false tigers. Poos hadn't been in the house three days before Betsy found out Poos was a ventriloquist. She never seemed to open her mouth, but she made Betsy and mamma open their mouths and talk in a special high voice they called "the Poos voice." Maybe Betsy spoke in the Poos voice, while mamma answered; or the other way round.

You are not here to think about Betsy, but to think about God. Concentrate. God is everything. God is love.

It was very clear, from the first, that Po loved Betsy much more than she loved ar body else. If there was any argument abo anything, Poos always took Betsy's part. F instance, when it was time for bed, Poos ma mamma say it was wrong to put such a lov little girl to bed so early. Betsy would lau so hard over how embarrassed mamma was have to say such a thing that she forgot to sorry about going to bed.

Laura, you are a scatterbrain. You will nev find God. The heavens declare the glory of G and the firmament showeth His handiwork.

When Betsy got a cold, Poos got a cold to Betsy didn't want to stay in bed and have th doctor, but Poos made things easier by usin mamma's voice, much squeakier and hoarse than usual, to tell about her doctor. He wa called Doctor Stripey because nobody kne whether he was a black cat with white stripe or a white cat with black stripes.

Doctor Stripey had been born and brough up in China, where, as everyone knows, pec ple do things backward, like reading fro right to left and shaking hands with them selves instead of with one another. So, o course, Doctor Stripey always prescribed fo his patients backward. When Poos coughed he'd say, "You don't need any medicine. Al you need is to go out and get your feet we and eat a lot of candy." Betsy used to argu and argue with Poos, trying to show her wha backward advice this was, but Poos wen right on believing Doctor Stripey. Naturall her cold got worse, while Betsy, taking th right medicine, got better. When Poos' voic became only a whisper, she stopped believin in Doctor Stripey. Until her next cold.

Abide in Me and I will abide in you.

Poos died when Betsy was fifteen, bu Betsy and mamma talked about her som times. Years afterward, on the night befor Betsy's wedding, mamma went into Betsy room. Betsy lay in bed, her brown hair sprea over the pillow. Mamma didn't say any thing, because there was so much to say, bu Betsy said, "I wish Poos was here."

May the peace of God, which passeth all u derstanding, fill your hearts and minds.

The room with the zebra rugs looked unrea to Laura. For a while she had been to a plac that was real. For a moment it was given h to know that in some sunlit world, ind structible as love, beyond the reach of tim over the edge of death, the little girl and t tiger kitten were still playing in their garde Not lost, not gone, not over, but safe in dimension where all other dimensions we outmoded.

"Terrible, wasn't it sit through it

it? I could hardly the second time."

Back in this everyday room, the light faded. God was as far away as ever. But the dry hardness in her heart was melted, and she wept. And she had no idea why.

"You would never have harmed that man," Doctor Tatum said.

Nick had dropped into St. Simon's late on Saturday and the funny-looking secretary said that Doctor Tatum just happened to be in from the country, going over his mail. Evidently Doctor Tatum had been using his hands in the country, because they were bound with adhesive tape.

"From what you've been telling me, I suspect that you're a proud man. You didn't kill Don Bellamy because he was you as a young man. He said and did what you said and did at his age. And you have too much pride to kill yourself. I think there was another reason, too, why you did not use the gun."

"Tell me. I can take it."

"You are at war with yourself. Trying to find out who you are. Don Bellamy has nothing to do with that war."

"That's true. I do keep wishing somebody could say to me, 'This is you.' Once and for all. It would be a comfort."

"What's that line you always have trouble remembering?"

"Blessed are they that mourn."

"Do you think it's a lie?"

"No. Not exactly. I think that what He meant was just that time is a great healer. But that's not the sort of comfort I want. That's not enough."

Doctor Tatum took a long time answering. Then he said, as if he didn't want to say anything, "I doubt if Christ was talking about the mere passage of time. If He had been, He would simply have said that those who mourned would be comforted. But He went further. He said they were blessed. I've always preached that those words mean exactly what they say. That those who mourn are blessed because theirs will be a special sort of comfort that only sorrow can bring."

"Can you figure out how I'll be comforted?"

"No. But I hope you will not commit the sin of not wanting to be comforted, a sin which is more common than you think. People clutch their crosses because it's easier to carry a cross, sometimes, than it is to lay it down. But I trust you are not that sort of man. And so, someday, you will find your own comfort. There'll come a time when something in your life will be lifted up, and it will draw you to it, and you will know who you are and what you want. And then you will be comforted." Doctor Tatum got up and opened the window behind him. By now it was dark outside. "The truth is that the people who mourn know what other people can never know, see what other people can never see. That is, if they walk through the valley of the shadow with their eyes open. That's why the cross is the symbol of Christianity, instead of a thousand happier symbols."

"Say, remember the first time I came here and you asked me if my name was Nicodemus? Why, he was the fellow who went to Christ in the middle of the night and wanted to know the low-down. Guess I'm kind of like that."

"Everybody makes me think of Nicodemus. This whole world is wondering, in the middle of the night, whether there's a God to find, and how they can find Him. In the middle of the night, mind you. By day, they won't admit it."

"I couldn't make sense out of what Christ said to Nicodemus about being born again."

"Neither could Nicodemus. Nobody does, until he's been through it. A man starts being born again when he suffers, when he starts thinking, not only about his own suffering but about everybody else's suffering. When he gets compassion, not for himself but the fellow next door. Maybe, when all he sees around him is darkness, he's being born again. I'll tell you what I have learned to hope. Somehow this whole age of ours is being born again. It's the fashion to call our times rotten and decadent. Those are the words of people who see only chaos. But I believe—I've got to believe—that this age has more new life stirring than any other. Our times are painful. They are cruel. They are bloody. But from this age of mourning, man will emerge—comforted—and alive."

SLEEP. Extinguished in a darkness where noise and silence, pain and pleasure, belief and unbelief were all the same. Now Job Tatum's nights had no dreams. As soon as his head struck the pillow, he dissolved in sleep, and, the next moment, the alarm clock sounded morning.

He had given up trying to force himself to believe. He saw, now, that forcing was as foolish as if he should try, by main strength, to mend a broken arm. Relax and wait. Heal from the inside. Easy does it. All in good time, he told himself every night. All in good time.

He was getting used to South Bleecker Street. The filth and smell and noise had stopped troubling him. However, so far, the people here were dull. As dull as the people uptown. No one seemed worth knowing. What a joke on him it would be, if he came to South Bleecker Street to get close to his fellow men, to be refreshed by his fellow men, and found a bartender who was a stuffed shirt, a priggish street sweeper, a tedious policeman, a smug butcher.

Perhaps Mr. Omar might be an exception. After dark, he sat on the front steps, smoking, with a Turkish fez on his bald head. Job asked him about the couple in the flat next to his. They were Bert and Liz Oak, Mr. Omar said. They had been married only about six months. Bert Oak had a good heart, because he let his wife's sister, Dell Royal, stay in the flat with her boy, seven years old, born out of wedlock. As for the rest of the folks at No. 12, Mr. Omar said they were all hard workers. You might say that even the streetwalker, who lived in the second floor, was a hard worker. Nobody held what she did against her, because she didn't bring her men to this house. Job met the streetwalker one day on the stairs and he would never have known what she was, if Mr. Omar hadn't told him. In the halls, on the stairs, sitting on the front steps with Mr. Omar, Job happened to meet everybody who lived at No. 12. Except the Oaks, and Dell Royal and her child.

Except for their clothes, they all seemed no different from the people uptown. Men came home from work with tabloids under their arms, or candy, or a pint of ice cream. After dinner they listened to the radio, or went to the movies, repeating, in another setting, the daily life of the parishioners at St. Simon's.

Down at the docks, his fellow workers were friendly. They told jokes they had heard on the radio, recited the plots of motion pictures, quoted from the newspapers, said what

Or ernoon in early August, Mr. on Job's door. "I thought mayl you wouldn't mind going with me to see my boy Leon. He's in an Army hospital over to Long Island."

"Wounded?"

"Not what you'd call wounded. He got a knock on the head over in France, but there ain't a scratch on him today. It's his memory. He don't remember nothing at all. The doctors ain't let me see him yet, but now they want me to. They think it might make him begin to remember. I'd like for you to be along. I don't know why, but I've took a shine to you."

"Be right with you."

Job liked Mr. Omar's asking him. He liked it better than anything that had happened in a long while. Perhaps now he was really beginning to get close, reach through, be in touch. Mr. Omar seemed like his best friend in the world.

They didn't talk much on the long subway ride. At the hospital a doctor in a white starched gown warned Mr. Omar how Leon would act and led them into a small room where a man stood alone by a window, looking out.

"Hello, Leon," the doctor said. "This is Mr. Tatum—and—your father."

Leon was gaunt. His face was somber. "Sorry not to remember," he said.

"That's all right—son." Mr. Omar's voice was thin and bright. "You look fine, Leon. I guess they take good care of you here."

"They keep me busy." Leon moved over to a table on which was something covered by a wet cloth. "Here's what I've been doing."

Job caught his breath. It was a statue of a dog, a large hungry mongrel dog, who might be running along South Bleecker Street, his muzzle to the ground.

"We're very proud of Leon," the doctor said. "He has the makings of a first-rate sculptor. We're planning to hold an exhibition of his work. To encourage the other men."

"But this ain't like you, Leon," Mr. Omar said. "You never did nothing like this."

The doctor frowned at Mr. Omar. "It sometimes happens in cases of this kind that hidden talents are uncovered."

Job asked, "Could we see Leon's other work?"

They went downstairs to the workshop. Leon's other statues were all strong and sure, like the mongrel dog. There was one that Leon called Memory, the figure of a woman with her face turned away. Here, with his sculpture, Leon did not look somber. His face lighted up. He talked and talked about what he planned to do. It was only when they went upstairs again that he lost his glow, and said, as if it were a lesson which he had learned, that he was sorry not to remember.

BACK on South Bleecker Street, Job stayed awhile in Mr. Omar's flat. Mr. Omar didn't want to be left alone. And Job was lonely too. He suddenly realized how lonely. It was fine, just sitting here with Mr. Omar. Job was close to Mr. Omar.

"Guess I'll have to be going," Job said, around midnight.

"Thanks for staying with me, Mr. Tatum."

"I think you were the one who stayed with me."

"Those statues Leon made. They're beautiful, ain't they?"

"They certainly are."

"It ain't everybody can make such things. I been studying it out to myself. Of course it hits you hard when your son don't know you. But it's like this, Mr. Tatum. If Leon can make those beautiful things—well, he don't have to remember me."

Nick and Melita were giving an after-theater supper. Melita's musical was opening tomorrow night. The apartment was full of food, smoke, drink and voices.

Nick liked the party. When they guests, it seemed as if Melita and he really a husband and wife, who loved other. ## Song of Loved Things

By Elizabeth-Ellen Long

In times of joy and times of grief
These I have loved beyond belief,
These I have loved and always will:
All trees that grow, and every hill,
Fields newly plowed, young corn in rows,
The old dark prophecies of crows,
Evening wind in willow thickets,
Frog songs and the songs of crickets,
Stone walls that wear frail lichen lace,
The daisy's round and sun-washed face,
Lanes over which wild grasses lean,
All things my own hands have scrubbed clean.
These I have loved in times of pain
And times of happiness: the rain,
First stars, white moonlight, nor shall I
Leave them behind the day I die!

The crowd brayed and screamed.

"What's it like in church, Nick?" Larg said. "Give. You're among friends."

They were smiling at Nick, breathing him, breathing vodka and smoke. He had say something. But if he should tell the the truth—what Doctor Tatum had sa about being born again, and how there w something about that sort of thing which y couldn't put out of your mind, once it g in—they'd start tapping their heads.

"Take it easy," Nick said. "Sure, I go ov to the church. I have to know how ministe act, don't I?"

"Show us how," somebody said. "Mal like the guy over at that church, Nick."

Nick made like the sort of guy they thoug a minister was. "Miserable sinners," squeaked, "repent or you'll burn in he fire." Everybody nearly died laughing. Ni was priceless. Nick was out of this world.

But no act could hold this crowd very lon Larry crashed down on the piano. The othe turned away, getting their glasses filled, p ing their plates. In another ten minute they would have forgotten. Melita had a ready forgotten. She was smiling at Do the palm of her hand flat against his.

Back in this everyday room, the light faded. God was as far away as ever. But the dry hardness in her heart was melted, and she wept. And she had no idea why.

"You would never have harmed that man," Doctor Tatum said.

Nick had dropped into St. Simon's late on Saturday and the funny-looking secretary said that Doctor Tatum just happened to be in from the country, going over his mail. Evidently Doctor Tatum had been using his hands in the country, because they were bound with adhesive tape.

"From what you've been telling me, I suspect that you're a proud man. You didn't kill Don Bellamy because he was you as a young man. He said and did what you said and did at his age. And you have too much pride to kill yourself. I think there was another reason, too, why you did not use the gun."

"Tell me. I can take it."

"You are at war with yourself. Trying to find out who you are. Don Bellamy has nothing to do with that war."

"That's true. I do keep wishing somebody could say to me, 'This is you.' Once and for all. It would be a comfort."

"What's that line you always have trouble remembering?"

"Blessed are they that mourn."

"Do you think it's a lie?"

"No. Not exactly. I think that what He meant was just that time is a great healer. But that's not the sort of comfort I want. That's not enough."

Doctor Tatum took a long time answering. Then he said, as if he didn't want to say anything, "I doubt if Christ was talking about the mere passage of time. If He had been, He would simply have said that those who mourned would be comforted. But He went further. He said they were blessed. I've always preached that those words mean exactly what they say. That those who mourn are blessed because theirs will be a special sort of comfort that only sorrow can bring."

"Can you figure out how I'll be comforted?"

"No. But I hope you will not commit the sin of not wanting to be comforted, a sin which is more common than you think. People clutch their crosses because it's easier to carry a cross, sometimes, than it is to lay it down. But I trust you are not that sort of man. And so, someday, you will find your own comfort. There'll come a time when something in your life will be lifted up, and it will draw you to it, and you will know who you are and what you want. And then you will be comforted." Doctor Tatum got up and opened the window behind him. By now it was dark outside. "The truth is that the people who mourn know what other people can never know, see what other people can never see. That is, if they walk through the valley of the shadow with their eyes open. That's why the cross is the symbol of Christianity, instead of a thousand happier symbols."

"Say, remember the first time I came here and you asked me if my name was Nicodemus? Why, he was the fellow who went to Christ in the middle of the night and wanted to know the low-down. Guess I'm kind of like that."

"Everybody makes me think of Nicodemus. This whole world is wondering, in the middle of the night, whether there's a God to find, and how they can find Him. In the middle of the night, mind you. By day, they won't admit it."

"I couldn't make sense out of what Christ said to Nicodemus about being born again."

"Neither could Nicodemus. Nobody does, until he's been through it. A man starts being born again when he suffers, when he starts thinking, not only about his own suffering but about everybody else's suffering. When he gets compassion, not for himself but the fellow next door. Maybe, when all he sees around him is darkness, he's being born again. I'll tell you what I have learned to hope. Somehow this whole age of ours is being born again. It's the fashion to call our times rotten and decadent. Those are the words of people who see only chaos. But I believe—I've got to believe—that this age has more new life stirring than any other. Our times are painful. They are cruel. They are bloody. But from this age of mourning, man will emerge—comforted—and alive."

SLEEP. Extinguished in a darkness where noise and silence, pain and pleasure, belief and unbelief were all the same. Now Job Tatum's nights had no dreams. As soon as his head struck the pillow, he dissolved in sleep, and, the next moment, the alarm clock sounded morning.

He had given up trying to force himself to believe. He saw, now, that forcing was as foolish as if he should try, by main strength, to mend a broken arm. Relax and wait. Heal from the inside. Easy does it. All in good time, he told himself every night. All in good time.

He was getting used to South Bleecker Street. The filth and smell and noise had stopped troubling him. However, so far, the people here were dull. As dull as the people uptown. No one seemed worth knowing. What a joke on him it would be, if he came to South Bleecker Street to get close to his fellow men, to be refreshed by his fellow men, and found a bartender who was a stuffed shirt, a priggish street sweeper, a tedious policeman, a smug butcher.

Perhaps Mr. Omar might be an exception. After dark, he sat on the front steps, smoking, with a Turkish fez on his bald head. Job asked him about the couple in the flat next to his. They were Bert and Liz Oak, Mr. Omar said. They had been married only about six months. Bert Oak had a good heart, because he let his wife's sister, Dell Royal, stay in the flat with her boy, seven years old, born out of wedlock. As for the rest of the folks at No. 12, Mr. Omar said they were all hard workers. You might say that even the streetwalker, who lived in the second floor, was a hard worker. Nobody held what she did against her, because she didn't bring her men to this house. Job met the streetwalker one day on the stairs and he would never have known what she was, if Mr. Omar hadn't told him. In the halls, on the stairs, sitting on the front steps with Mr. Omar, Job happened to meet everybody who lived at No. 12. Except the Oaks, and Dell Royal and her child.

Except for their clothes, they all seemed no different from the people uptown. Men came home from work with tabloids under their arms, or candy, or a pint of ice cream. After dinner they listened to the radio, or went to the movies, repeating, in another setting, the daily life of the parishioners at St. Simon's.

Down at the docks, his fellow workers were friendly. They told jokes they had heard on the radio, recited the plots of motion pictures, quoted from the newspapers, said what hat held her, transfixed. If she turned and ooked over her shoulder —— But she was fraid to turn—and then the otherness was one.

She came up to the street with the box nder her arm. No. It had not been an illuion. The otherness was real, more real than nything she had ever known. More actual han the sidewalk under her feet, or the tall apery buildings, or the people who were hadows gliding past.

Gradually the buildings stopped being paery, and the people were flesh and blood. Everything was almost the same. But not quite. And she did not feel at all tired. She walked lightly to the post office and laid her burden down at the window.

Sunlight is pouring over the hills, the plains, the valleys. Housewives hang their washing in the sun. Children play in the sun. Bathers on the beaches bare their bodies to the sun.

Ever since you, Laura, a very ordinary woman, had known that otherness, you had belonged. You did not have that dreadful sense of being outside the world and trying to get back in. That panic, that sense of slippery surface under your hands, had gone. You knew, now, that there was no such thing as being outside the world.

The more you thought about what had happened, the more real it seemed. You could never live it over again, like any other event, but it was real. It was like suddenly, when you least expect it, seeing or hearing something beautiful; like the moment when you lose yourself in beauty, before you start saying why it is beautiful and asking who is the artist. But the otherness was better than beauty.

You were not unique. The experience you had known must happen to a lot of people. Only they never told about it. You would never tell. Because you could not make the experience real to anyone who hadn't known. It could be told only with new words.

But the people who had known that otherness should have a special way of nodding at one another. As if to say, "We know. We were surprised, like you. We belong. We are not alone."

Maybe churches, back in the beginning, had been meant to be that special sort of nodding. And they had called that otherness God.

Such an experience as yours was supposed to make you "better." But you were no better. You were almost the same Laura. With your headaches and your nerves. With your old set of sins. You were no kinder or more patient, and you had not forgiven your enemies. What were you supposed to do? Were you simply to wait for the otherness to come again?

Be still. The otherness is always near you. It does not really come and go; it does not live or cease to live. It is steadfast, and you are not steadfast. Because you are human, you cannot know it all the while. You could not bear it. Take heart. Be still. You have known what you have known. Rest there a while.

JOB TATUM dreamed he was down at the docks and all the men had hammers. He woke. Someone was knocking at the door. It was not yet midnight. He threw on his dressing gown, shoved his feet into slippers and opened the door. A woman he had never seen confronted him.

"I'm Dell Royal," she said. "I live next door, with Bert and Liz. I'm sorry to —but my little boy if you could come over ——"

He stopped only to take his money from the bureau. He had learned not to leave money lying around at No. 12. They went through a kitchen into a room with a single bed and a cot on which lay a small boy gasping for breath.

"Asthma," Dell Royal said. "I'm out of his pills. If you could stay with him while I run to the drugstore ——" She turned to the child. "Mamma will be right back, Pete darling. Mr. Tatum's going to stay with you. I'm sorry to bother you like this, Mr. Tatum. But Liz is at the movies and Bert has gone bowling."

Job put his arm around the boy, propping him upright against the pillow. The small body felt hot. O Father in heaven, send down Thy healing. The words he had spoken by so many bedsides came by habit to his lips, but he did not say them aloud. He reached into the pocket of his gown.

"Why, look, Pete. You're a magic boy. You have a quarter coming right out of your nose." It was one of the tricks he had learned from his father.

Pete looked. Coins came out of his nose, his ears, out of the air. Pete's voice was choked and husky. "Gee, that's keen."

Job was still making magic when Dell Royal came in. She was older than he had thought; around thirty. Her brown eyes were anxious.

"He's better."

"It comes and goes like that." She stooped over the cot. "You're fine now, Pete. Go to sleep."

"Will the man stay till I'm asleep?"

"I'll stay," Job promised. "I'll wait in the kitchen till your mother says you're asleep."

HE went out. The kitchen had a table covered with yellow oilcloth, and four straight chairs painted yellow. The curtains were yellow-checked gingham. It looked like the sort of kitchen Dell Royal would have. But not Bert and Liz Oak. Job wiped his forehead. No air was stirring. Dell Royal came out of the bedroom, leaving the door ajar. She pushed a yellow glow of hair back from her forehead.

"You've been so kind," she said. "I'm sorry I had to bother you. But Liz and Bert have to get out once in a while."

He was conscious now of his dressing gown and slippers. But she did not seem to be. He had a feeling she never noticed unimportant things.

"I'll make us some coffee." She went over to the oilstove. "After Pete has one of his attacks I always feel like coffee."

There was something about her which did not belong to South Bleecker Street. And yet she behaved as if she were at home here. Probably, anywhere she was, she would be at home. But how did he know? He had never seen her before.

"The doctor thinks Pete would be better in the country. I'm saving up to take him there."

"The country is where you belong. Not South Bleecker Street."

"Liz and I used to live in Ohio till"—she stopped—"till just before Pete was born. Then we moved here, and Liz married Bert." She stopped again. "You know, Mr. Tatum, you don't seem to belong here, either."

"What makes you say that?"

"Oh, it's just a feeling. That's what I go by. Feelings I have."

He would have asked her about her feelings, but Liz came in. "Bert home?"

"Not yet," Dell answered. "Pete had one of his attacks and Mr. Tatum came in. Have some coffee."

Liz did not ask anything about Pete. She drank her coffee, her eyes on the door. Bright moist eyes.

Dell looked in the bedroom and shut the door. "All right now, Mr. Tatum. Pete's asleep. I certainly appreciate your courtesy."

Mr. Omar had asked Gladys to the party he was giving for Leon. Leon had come back home, with his memory as good as ever. The doctors said it sometimes happened like that, all of a sudden.

Mr. Omar had worked hard, getting ready for the party. There were pink paper streamers from the light in the ceiling out to the corners of the room. On the wall there was a big sign framed with ferns: WELCOME OUR HERO LEON. Out in the kitchen was a table with beer and lemonade and things to eat.

Mr. Omar said almost everybody on South Bleecker Street was there. Gladys liked all the people except perhaps a couple called Bert and Liz who made her feel kind of embarrassed, the way they carried on. Leon was a lovely fellow.

"Where you been all my life?" he said to Gladys. He said it to everybody all evening. "Gee, it's great to be home! I'm gonna take a week off and paint the town red and then I'm gonna get my old truckin' job back. Am lucky!"

"It must of been terrible at the hospital when you ——"

"Say, that was funny. For a while I couldn't remember a thing. They say I wasn't crazy. But I must of been. The doctors showed me some sissy stuff I made. Statues. Can you tie that? They said I ought to be proud of it but it darned near made me sick in my stummick. Gee, am I glad I scrammed outa there! Come on, kid. Beat feet. Where you been all my life?"

Around midnight, Gladys noticed that Mr. Omar was missing. She was afraid he might be sick or something, so she started looking for him. She found him in the back room, sitting on the bed. His head was bent down and his face was swollen, like he'd been crying. He was holding a little statue of a woman who was looking back over her shoulder.

"Leon made this," Mr. Omar told Gladys. "At the hospital. It is called Memory."

"It's just lovely, Mr. Omar. Leon was telling me ——"

"Go back to the party. It ain't right for you, a young girl, not to have a good time. Soon enough you should grow up and have your troubles."

She sat down on the bed and put her arm around Mr. Omar. He really had been crying. His face was wet. "Why, you mustn't cry, Mr. Omar. Suppose Leon hadn't ever remembered you? Then you'd have something to cry about."

But tears kept on running out of the corners of Mr. Omar's eyes.

Reverend Primrose had said so much to Gladys about what he called "the social gospel," that she had begun to understand that, with the love of God in your heart, you could try to make His kingdom come on earth. And His kingdom, according to Reverend Primrose, was better living conditions.

ST. SIMON'S had a lot of women's societies for improving what Reverend Primrose said were "conditions." She looked over the list in the church bulletin. The Guild. Home missionary. Foreign Missionary. World service. Race Relations. But all of them must be run by women who had free afternoons. It looked as if women with jobs didn't get a chance at the kingdom. And then she saw, at the foot of the page, The Red Cross Room Open Daily From Two to Five Including Saturdays. Members and Friends Welcome. She felt proud to know she was more than a friend.

But Saturday afternoon, when she got to the Red Cross room, she had a feeling that she wasn't dressed right. She was wearing her navy-blue suit and beanie, and the women workers were sitting at long tables in white hoods and gowns, but they looked up other like they hadn't come here in suits and beanies.

There was a Grey Lady at a desk who seemed to be head of it all. "Yes?" she said. Even in her uniform, you could tell she was rich, terribly rich. It was queer how you knew.

"I wanted to help. I'm a member."

"A member?" the woman said. "You mean from our—our establishment—on South Bleecker Street?"

"No," Gladys said. "I'm affiliated here at St. Simon's."

The Grey Lady looked surprised. "We must have skilled workers, you know. Right now we are making baby clothes."

It would be wonderful to write Jake she was sewing on baby clothes. She would tell him she was getting into practice. "I've done a lot of sewing. I've made my own dresses."

"Very well." The Grey Lady sighed. "Put your things on the rack. I'll give you some nightgowns to start with."

Gladys put her beanie on the shelf among all the wonderful hats with ribbons and flowers. She hung her suit coat among the summer fur jackets. Ordinarily, she would be embarrassed at being in a place where all the others had such different clothes. But this was the church, where, Reverend Primrose said, in the eyes of God everybody was the same.

THE Grey Lady—the others called her Elfrida darling—gave her a hood and a gown and some pieces of flannel and showed her where to stitch, although she could see that for herself. She sat down at the end of a table where about twenty ladies were sewing. They didn't seem to notice her, except for looking at one another out of the corners of their eyes, and talking in queer voices, like they were saying something they didn't want her to hear.

Gladys thought it was very uninteresting talk. She put her mind on tiny even stitches, and on the baby who would wear this gown. If it was hers and Jake's baby, she would embroider the gown with little flowers.

"May I look?" It was Elfrida darling. She took up Gladys' gown and showed it to the others. "I wish you all could sew like that. It's really a little work of art."

Gladys was so pleased. She would write Jake what the Grey Lady had said, right out in front of everybody: a little work of art.

"I'm Mrs. Sampson," one of the ladies at the table said. "Mrs. Walter Sampson. What is your name, my dear?"

"Miss Foster. Miss Gladys Foster."

"I suppose," Mrs. Sampson said, "you just sew for yourself? Not for—anybody else?"

"I don't get much time. I have a job. In the subway. I make change."

"Isn't that remarkable?" Mrs. Sampson turned to the others. "Imagine being able to add and subtract like that! But, my dear, if you went to people's houses and sewed, you would get a great deal more money than you earn in the subway."

"I don't want to change jobs now. You see, Jake has been where I work and he can picture me there. I wouldn't want to go where Jake couldn't picture me."

But just as she and Mrs. Sampson were getting on so nicely, a man came in with a camera and said he was going to take their photograph for the society page. Gladys felt very happy, because she could send the photograph to Jake. But the ladies whispered together in a corner, and then Elfrida darling came over.

"I wonder, my dear," she said, "if you would mind not being in this picture? You see, it's your first time here, and—well, this is supposed to be a picture of our regular workers."

Gladys was disappointed, but she could see how fair it was. She kept on sewing while the ladies lined up in a corner. It took a long while for them to decide just how they wanted to stand, except that Elfrida darling was always in the middle. And just as it was settled, in came Reverend Primrose. They all said, "Good afternoon, Mr. Primrose," and turned their teeth back to the camera.

"Hold on a minute," Reverend Primrose said.

Mrs. Sampson said, "Now, Mr. Primrose, surely you aren't going to mind our having a picture?"

on the blanket, her head propped in her hand. The sun blazed in her yellow hair.

"Really, Dell, I can't make you out." He could not resist saying it. "You have a difficult life, and yet you're not unhappy. What makes you like that, Dell?"

"My life doesn't seem difficult to me, Mr. Tatum."

"But why? I'm not asking just to be curious. I have a feeling that if I could find out why your life doesn't seem difficult, I'd—well, I'd have the answer to something that's wrong with me. There must be something in human beings that makes them bear lives that look, from the outside, unbearable. I've come to believe that the sum of human happiness is as great on South Bleecker Street as anywhere else, in spite of the living conditions there. That means there's a mystery at the heart of man. What is it, Dell?"

"People take pleasure in things, Mr. Tatum. That's all I know."

"Ann—I mean Dell—do you believe in God?"

A shadow went over her face. "Let's stop talking." She lay on her back and stared up at the sun. "It's so lovely here, and I'm so sleepy."

It was lonely here on the Atlantic out of sight of land, with the pale sky, the burning sun, and the sea water that heaved and plunged. So might it all have looked millions of years before man came on the earth. And where, before man came, had the mercy of God been? Had it brooded over the dinosaurs? Was it compassionate toward the ichthyosaurus?

Laura was setting the table. Betsy and her husband, Evan, home on furlough, were coming for dinner. There was a new maid, Mrs. Bogleman, but she had seen better days and needed a lot of help with the work, and was sensitive. Laura must warn Henry to remember how sensitive Mrs. Bogleman was when she served him on the right side or brought the vegetables in the gravy boat. She did hope Henry would be pleasant. He, who had always warned her that Betsy must become adult, was apt to treat Betsy as if she were a child and say something which Betsy's carefully cultivated sense of independence resented.

O Lord, let Henry be pleasant tonight, Laura prayed, laying the salad forks. And then she offered up another prayer: O Lord, let me not be frightened by Betsy and Evan. They seem so strong and knowing. They make me feel old and stupid and say silly things. Let me not be frightened.

THE young people came at seven. Betsy was sleek and rosy, her shining hair arranged in a halo cut, her figure what a figure should be, her clothes immaculate with no little middle-aged bunches. Evan glittered in his uniform. Young people did not seem to feel inadequate. They did not have to pull themselves together. Looking at them, Laura felt that old alarming sense of being fuzzy in her mind; her hair was worse than usual; her dress did not quite fit; everything she said had one foot in the grave. She was afraid.

But suppose there was everlasting life? And forever actually was forever? Then she was not old. Compared with forever, she was very young indeed. The thought was exhilarating. She trusted her mind to it, carefully, like a skater venturing on thin ice. It held. How foolish to feel old and tired in front of Betsy and Evan, when, in eternity, everyone was young! And she took a long breath and leaned back in her chair, and she was not afraid.

Henry was pleasant at dinner. He spared Mrs. Bogleman. He did not, as usual, intimate that Betsy did not feel what she thought she felt. He did not bore Evan with comments on the war which had already been heard on his broadcasts. In fact, Henry hardly spoke at all. Laura began to feel uneasy. Two prayers answered in only a couple of hours? So many desperate prayers rising all over the world, and here God came right into this room and made Henry pleasant. It just couldn't be. But afterward, in the living-room with the zebra rugs, Henry continued to be gracious. Betsy and Evan were sitting on the white sofa. Evan's hand was laid lightly over Betsy's.

"I wonder you didn't notice something special about us," Betsy said in her young voice.

Laura looked carefully. Betsy seemed the same. Except that perhaps she had tonight a bit of the simplicity of the child who had played with the tiger kitten. And a bit more that child's wonder.

"You tell them, Evan," Betsy said, and her voice sparkled.

He said, "No. You."

"Well," Betsy said, drawing a long breath. She looked at Evan, and at Henry, but her radiant eyes stayed with her mother. "You're going to need Poos again. A grandmother must have a Poos."

LAURA'S voice had caught in her throat. She held out her arms and Betsy came over and sat on the floor beside her, her head in Laura's lap.

"Are you pleased, mamma?"

Laura finally said, "It's a miracle."

"There's no miracle in having a baby," Henry said, but not unpleasantly. "It would be a miracle if these young people didn't have a baby."

Laura smoothed Betsy's hair. Betsy and she talked together without words. And she smiled at Evan while Henry spoke about doctors and nurses. Now, at Laura's shoulder, there was again that otherness. The presence of a merciful God in the house of an ordinary woman. But this time, loving her child, she was not afraid to trust that otherness. Even if it meant losing herself as she knew herself. She turned and looked over her shoulder.

And she was not lost, she was found.

Shouting is the effort of a limited mind to express itself.

—From Our Wife (Columbia Picture).

Play rehearsals would start in two weeks. Now Nick could work in earnest. Every morning he could shut himself up in his room and study, not only his own part but the play itself. This dream of a better world—it could come true, or it could fizzle out. After victory, people's hearts would sag with weariness and disillusionment. Spectacular heroism in war was easy compared with the long, grinding pull of peace. All this the play said. And he would carry its chief burden. He had slipped already into his role. He was even thinking like a minister.

The play and the role protected him. He lived in a circle that his work had drawn around him. For the time being, he was saved from suffering too much over Mel and Don. He could even sit here in his study and think of Don, not as the man Mel might love but as the actor who had the part in the play, of the stuffy mayor, whose idea of heaven was to get on the right side of an influential seraph and work his way up. What really mattered was whether Don would make a competent mayor. Perhaps he would. The role had no depth.

There was a knock on the door and Mel came in. She was wearing her green taffeta house gown that whispered as she walked, green as a violet leaf, and there were violets on her shoulder, and her blue-black hair curled about her throat. Oh, yes. When the play had settled down, he would suffer again over this woman.

"I'm busy, Melita. What is it?"

She sat down near the desk, leaned back, crossed her green whispering knees, lighted a cigarette. Her fingers tapped the chair arm, the toe of her sandal made a small restless circle. She was nervous, and that was not like her. If he had not been protected by his work, he would have been afraid.

"Nick, you used to promise me that you would do anything for me. All I had to do was ask. You've said that so many times."

He only nodded, smiling. His mind was on the play.

"This part can't mean so much to you. After all, you've had so many successes."

Back in this everyday room, the light faded. God was as far away as ever. But the dry hardness in her heart was melted, and she wept. And she had no idea why.

"You would never have harmed that man," Doctor Tatum said.

Nick had dropped into St. Simon's late on Saturday and the funny-looking secretary said that Doctor Tatum just happened to be in from the country, going over his mail. Evidently Doctor Tatum had been using his hands in the country, because they were bound with adhesive tape.

"From what you've been telling me, I suspect that you're a proud man. You didn't kill Don Bellamy because he was you as a young man. He said and did what you said and did at his age. And you have too much pride to kill yourself. I think there was another reason, too, why you did not use the gun."

"Tell me. I can take it."

"You are at war with yourself. Trying to find out who you are. Don Bellamy has nothing to do with that war."

"That's true. I do keep wishing somebody could say to me, 'This is you.' Once and for all. It would be a comfort."

"What's that line you always have trouble remembering?"

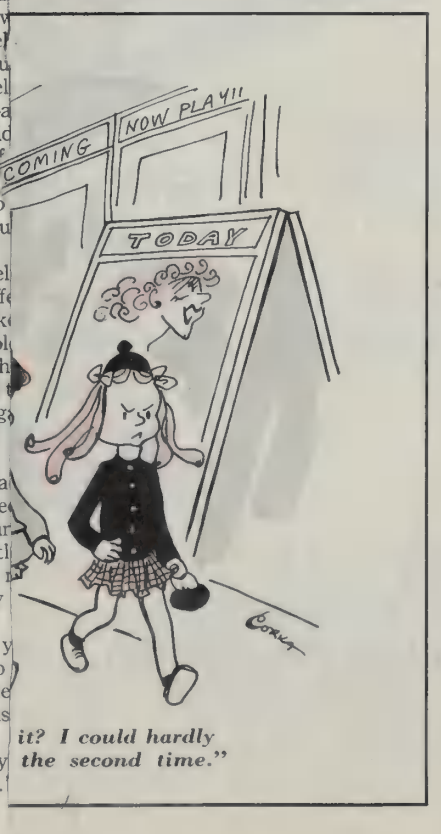
"Blessed are they that mourn."

"Do you think it's a lie?"

"No. Not exactly. I think that what He meant was just that time is a great healer. But that's not the sort of comfort I want. That's not enough."

Doctor Tatum took a long time answering. Then he said, as if he didn't want to say anything, "I doubt if Christ was talking about the mere passage of time. If He had been, He would simply have said that those who mourned would be comforted. But He went further. He said they were blessed. I've always preached that those words mean exactly what they say. That those who mourn are blessed because theirs will be a special sort of comfort that only sorrow can bring."

"Can you figure out how I'll be comforted?"



"No. But I hope you will not commit the sin of not wanting to be comforted, a sin which is more common than you think. People clutch their crosses because it's easier to carry a cross, sometimes, than it is to lay it down. But I trust you are not that sort of man. And so, someday, you will find your own comfort. There'll come a time when something in your life will be lifted up, and it will draw you to it, and you will know who you are and what you want. And then you will be comforted." Doctor Tatum got up and opened the window behind him. By now it was dark outside. "The truth is that the people who mourn know what other people can never know, see what other people can never see. That is, if they walk through the valley of the shadow with their eyes open. That's why the cross is the symbol of Christianity, instead of a thousand happier symbols."

"Say, remember the first time I came here and you asked me if my name was Nicodemus? Why, he was the fellow who went to Christ in the middle of the night and wanted to know the low-down. Guess I'm kind of like that."

"Everybody makes me think of Nicodemus. This whole world is wondering, in the middle of the night, whether there's a God to find, and how they can find Him. In the middle of the night, mind you. By day, they won't admit it."

"I couldn't make sense out of what Christ said to Nicodemus about being born again."

"Neither could Nicodemus. Nobody does, until he's been through it. A man starts being born again when he suffers, when he starts thinking, not only about his own suffering but about everybody else's suffering. When he gets compassion, not for himself but the fellow next door. Maybe, when all he sees around him is darkness, he's being born again. I'll tell you what I have learned to hope. Somehow this whole age of ours is being born again. It's the fashion to call our times rotten and decadent. Those are the words of people who see only chaos. But I believe—I've got to believe—that this age has more new life stirring than any other. Our times are painful. They are cruel. They are bloody. But from this age of mourning, man will emerge—comforted—and alive."

it? I could hardly the second time."

SLEEP. Extinguished in a darkness where noise and silence, pain and pleasure, belief and unbelief were all the same. Now Job Tatum's nights had no dreams. As soon as his head struck the pillow, he dissolved in sleep, and, the next moment, the alarm clock sounded morning.

He had given up trying to force himself to believe. He saw, now, that forcing was as foolish as if he should try, by main strength, to mend a broken arm. Relax and wait. Heal from the inside. Easy does it. All in good time, he told himself every night. All in good time.

He was getting used to South Bleecker Street. The filth and smell and noise had stopped troubling him. However, so far, the people here were dull. As dull as the people uptown. No one seemed worth knowing. What a joke on him it would be, if he came to South Bleecker Street to get close to his fellow men, to be refreshed by his fellow men, and found a bartender who was a stuffed shirt, a priggish street sweeper, a tedious policeman, a smug butcher.

Perhaps Mr. Omar might be an exception. After dark, he sat on the front steps, smoking, with a Turkish fez on his bald head. Job asked him about the couple in the flat next to his. They were Bert and Liz Oak, Mr. Omar said. They had been married only about six months. Bert Oak had a good heart, because he let his wife's sister, Dell Royal, stay in the flat with her boy, seven years old, born out of wedlock. As for the rest of the folks at No. 12, Mr. Omar said they were all hard workers. You might say that even the streetwalker, who lived in the second floor, was a hard worker. Nobody held what she did against her, because she didn't bring her men to this house. Job met the streetwalker one day on the stairs and he would never have known what she was, if Mr. Omar hadn't told him. In the halls, on the stairs, sitting on the front steps with Mr. Omar, Job happened to meet everybody who lived at No. 12. Except the Oaks, and Dell Royal and her child.

Except for their clothes, they all seemed no different from the people uptown. Men came home from work with tabloids under their arms, or candy, or a pint of ice cream. After dinner they listened to the radio, or went to the movies, repeating, in another setting, the daily life of the parishioners at St. Simon's.

Down at the docks, his fellow workers were friendly. They told jokes they had heard on the radio, recited the plots of motion pictures, quoted from the newspapers, said what corners of the room. On the wall there was a big sign framed with ferns: WELCOME OUR HERO LEON. Out in the kitchen was a table with beer and lemonade and things to eat.

Mr. Omar said almost everybody on South Bleecker Street was there. Gladys liked all the people except perhaps a couple called Bert and Liz who made her feel kind of embarrassed, the way they carried on. Leon was a lovely fellow.

"Where you been all my life?" he said to Gladys. He said it to everybody all evening. "Gee, it's great to be home! I'm gonna take a week off and paint the town red and then I'm gonna get my old truckin' job back. Am I lucky!"

"It must of been terrible at the hospital when you ——"

"Say, that was funny. For a while I couldn't remember a thing. They say I wasn't crazy. But I must of been. The doctors showed me some sissy stuff I made. Statues. Can you tie that? They said I ought to be proud of it but it darned near made me sick in my stummick. Gee, am I glad I scrammed outa there! Come on, kid. Beat feet. Where you been all my life?"

Around midnight, Gladys noticed that Mr. Omar was missing. She was afraid he might be sick or something, so she started looking for him. She found him in the back room, sitting on the bed. His head was bent down and his face was swollen, like he'd been crying. He was holding a little statue of a woman who was looking back over her shoulder.

"Leon made this," Mr. Omar told Gladys. "At the hospital. It is called Memory."

"It's just lovely, Mr. Omar. Leon was telling me ——"

"Go back to the party. It ain't right for you, a young girl, not to have a good time. Soon enough you should grow up and have your troubles."

She sat down on the bed and put her arm around Mr. Omar. He really had been crying. His face was wet. "Why, you mustn't cry, Mr. Omar. Suppose Leon hadn't ever remembered you? Then you'd have something to cry about."

But tears kept on running out of the corners of Mr. Omar's eyes.

Reverend Primrose had said so much to Gladys about what he called "the social gospel," that she had begun to understand that, with the love of God in your heart, you could try to make His kingdom come on earth. And His kingdom, according to Reverend Primrose, was better living conditions.

ST. SIMON'S had a lot of women's societies for improving what Reverend Primrose said were "conditions." She looked over the list of the church bulletin. The Guild. Home Missionary. Foreign Missionary. World Service. Race Relations. But all of them seemed to be run by women who had free afternoons. It looked as if women with jobs couldn't get a chance at the kingdom. And then she saw, at the foot of the page, The Red Cross Room Open Daily From Two to Five Including Saturdays. Members and Friends Welcome. She felt proud to know that was more than a friend.

But Saturday afternoon, when she got to the Red Cross room, she had a feeling that she wasn't dressed right. She was wearing her navy-blue suit and beanie, and the women workers were sitting at long tables in white hoods and gowns, but they looked up over their glasses like they hadn't come here in suits and beanies.

When the play had settled down, he would suffer again over this woman.

"I'm busy, Melita. What is it?"

She sat down near the desk, leaned back, crossed her green whispering knees, lighted a cigarette. Her fingers tapped the chair arm; the toe of her sandal made a small restless circle. She was nervous, and that was not like her. If he had not been protected by his work, he would have been afraid.

"Nick, you used to promise me that you would do anything for me. All I had to do was ask. You've said that so many times."

He only nodded, smiling. His mind was on the play.

"This part can't mean so much to you. After all, you've had so many successes."

IN THE FILES of the DuBarry Success Course are thousands upon thousands of true success stories, but none more remarkable than that of Dorothy Mullins of Danbury, Connecticut.

Dorothy was 34 years old. Only five feet tall, she weighed 215 pounds. Deeply sensitive about her size, she had long been resigned to what she thought was her lot in life. Social affairs were not for her. Evenings she just stayed home with her family.

Several times, but always with lessening hope, Dorothy had tried so-called reducing diets, but none brought results. Then she began to hear about the DuBarry Success Course. She sent for information. The Course could be taken at home—that was important.

Dorothy was advised first of all to go to her doctor, have a thorough physical examination, tell him what she planned to do. With his approval, she started. She lost 8 pounds the first week, 31 pounds in 6 weeks. At first some of the exercises were a little difficult for her because of her size, but soon she was really enjoying them. In six months she went through the Course four times—lost a total of 87 pounds, reduced her bust 8 inches, her waist 9 inches, her abdomen 12, her hips 14. Accustomed to wearing a size 44 dress, she found she could slip into a 14.

In spite of all this weight loss, Dorothy's skin is smooth, her body firm. She has learned to care for her complexion, to arrange her hair becomingly, to use make-up properly. Starting under a great handicap, she has made herself an attractive woman, with a good figure.

But Dorothy Mullins is free not only from the burden of weight, but from a feeling of inferiority. "Gradually," she says, "it is dawning on me that my life's dream is coming true. I can't begin to tell you what a thrill even the little things give me—such as sitting in a chair and not filling it, or having others say, 'There's room for one more, you don't take up much space.' It's as if a new world had opened for me. The experience has made me so happy that never, never can I thank you enough."

Of course, the case of Dorothy Mullins is unusual. Few women need to lose 87 pounds. But her achievement offers convincing proof to countless other women with far less to lose that they need not be overweight. Dorothy Mullins has emphasized what a quarter of a million other women have happily discovered—that the DuBarry Success Course is a plan that really works. It can help you bring your weight to normal, have a figure you're proud of, have a smooth, glowing skin, learn glamorous make-up, look better, feel better, make the most of yourself.

And you can enjoy this plan at home—at a cost so low it will surprise you. You follow the same methods taught by Ann Delafield at the famous Richard Hudnut Salon on Fifth Avenue, New York.

Absorbed as he was, her words reached him. But all he felt was a sort of mild surprise that she did not know how much the play meant to him. He thought that in every word, every gesture, he had told her.

"Bliss said if you dropped out of the play he would have to give the part to Don." Her voice caressed the word. "It would mean such a lot to him, Nick. If he made a hit he would be set for life." She smiled radiantly. "Please, Nick. Just for my sake, let Don have the part." She was holding on to herself, but there was a white line around her lips. "You said you would do anything for me."

"You love Don Bellamy." He was astonished at the loud sharp tone in which he could say those words he had always dreaded.

"A woman can't help how she feels, Nick. But I'd never dream of leaving you—if you could do me just this one little favor."

It was as if she were asking him to go down to the corner and get her a box of chocolates. "Does Don know you're asking me?"

"Yes. But he said I mustn't. The tears came to his eyes when I said I was going to ask you." Her voice rose theatrically. "He thinks of me and never of himself. And if I could just feel I had helped him, that would be"—she dabbed at her eyes with her blue handkerchief—"that would be all I'd ask."

Only two utterly selfish egoists could hatch up a plan like this. Two shoddy people. Nick began to feel an invigorating fury. "Not on your life," he said.

She narrowed her eyes and her voice soured. "Suppose I was to leave you, Nick?"

She had said that before, jokingly, and he had begged her not to say it. He had been so humble. No wonder she had thought he might do this for her; he had encouraged her to believe there was no limit. He stared at her, with the violets on her shoulders, as if he had never seen her before.

"Listen, Melita. My work is me. The real self I've been hunting for. From the days when it was hard to get a start to the time when I was a star, my work has been me. It was only when I married you that I forgot it. But I remember it now. And it matters more than anything else, more than you or anything else in the whole world." He paused. "Thank you for asking me to give up the part. If you hadn't asked me, maybe I would never have known."

"I'll leave you. That's what I'll do. I'll go to Don."

"I'll want you sometimes, Melita." His voice shook. "I'll miss you. After you're gone, I'll call myself a fool. But right now I see who I am and what I want. Like—like somebody said I would. And I see that, compared to my work, you have little to offer. You'll fail me. You won't last."

She went to the door, the green taffeta billowing and hissing behind her. The battle was over. He had peace. The dead flat silence of peace. He was very tired. Although he knew who he was and what he wanted, he was tired. He folded his arms over the script of the play and laid his head on them. After the fury and the glow of battle, peace was a weary bitter thing.

HERE I am sitting at the washstand that I made into a desk and getting ready to write you a letter, Jake. I always write you just before I go to bed, because then I feel the closest. But I never can think of anything to say except I love you. Maybe it's because I'm trying to sound cheerful, like they tell you to on the radio, and I'm not cheerful.

I wish we'd had somewhere to go that last time you was here. I thought being away from you would get easier, but it doesn't. It's worse. I know God is taking care of you, but I wish I was taking care of you.

The people talk on the radio about how you're fighting for a better world, where the common man will have a chance. Well, you aren't a common man. You're wonderful. Mrs. Kraken says her son Sammy isn't a common man either because he's going to be a lawyer, and Mr. Omar says it don't fit his son Leon. I haven't met anybody who'll say that anybody he knows is the common man. I asked one of the subway guards and he said, "There's no such thing as the common man. He's a guy the politicians made up." So I can't understand how you're fighting for somebody that nobody is, Jake, and I hope you don't hear about it and get worried.

I had a funny dream the other night. I dreamed I heard a baby crying. It was so real that when I woke up I couldn't believe I'd been dreaming. I got up and looked all around the room, but there wasn't nobody.

I better start writing you. It's getting late. "Dear Jake: Your last letter was so wonderful. I carry it around with me everywheres. Don't you worry about me, because I'm feeling just fine. Like a million dollars. It won't be long now till I see you. . . ."

If only time could have stood still that afternoon. When she sat on the lawn with the sun shining and the grass green and she read aloud to the child and the child's head was in her lap. If I were to be consulted about heaven, she thought, I would choose that afternoon. But maybe it was heaven. Perhaps, just for that afternoon, I stepped in ahead of time. Maybe we all do.

They were sitting before the fireplace, after one of Mrs. Bogleman's bad dinners, when Henry asked if she had noticed that he hadn't said very much lately. And he told her that for the last couple of weeks he'd felt a sort of lump in his right side. Of course it was nothing, but ——

He seemed smaller. His face was pinched and drawn down to a point. And it stabbed her. She had always kept on thinking of Henry as a young man—as young as on the day she wore the wedding veil. But now she could see he was not young, and it seemed like her fault, because a woman always feels that everything that happens in her house is, in some way, her fault. She should not have let Henry get old. She ought to have kept him from being smaller, and stooped, with those lines in his face.

He pulled up his shirt and there the lump was. She could feel it with her fingers. Lots of people, she told him, had lumps like that and they turned out to be only cysts or something, and of course it was terribly trivial, but perhaps he should see a doctor because even a tiny cyst was better if you didn't let it go too long, and they decided to go tomorrow morning. They went to bed early and Henry took a large dose of phenobarbital, because knocking yourself out with phenobarbital was easier than finding a philosophy of life that would let you go to sleep.

She lay in the bed next to Henry's. Even Betsy or getting in touch with God seemed unimportant compared with Henry. Ever since the night Betsy had said she was going to have a baby and the otherness had come again, and she had dared look over her shoulder, there had been a voice inside her, like the watch on a ship, saying that all was well. Now was the time for that voice, but she could not hear it. This was Henry. The heart of her heart. He had a lump in his side that might be cancer. Prayer? But there was no use praying that Henry's lump might not be cancer, because, if it was cancer, the harm had already been done. For such a thing, a person ought to start praying years ahead. . . . After half an hour, she got up and took an even larger dose of phenobarbital than Henry had.

Next morning, Henry and she were in the doctor's waiting room with twenty other people, reading the old magazines that everybody joked about. But it did not matter what the magazines were, because most of the people did not know what they were reading. They were sick with fear, as well as with whatever they had; it was fear of which they wanted, most of all, to be healed. She kept telling Henry he had never looked so well in all his life. She had been a fool to think about God. She should have thought, instead, about Henry.

The doctor, who was a big shot with plenty of office equipment, made tests, took X rays. The result wouldn't be known until tomorrow, but Henry was going to be okay, old man. Henry went to the studio, and, since it was Mrs. Bogleman's day off, Laura cleaned the apartment. Better than it had been cleaned since war was declared. Henry and she were very cheerful at dinner. Afterward they read aloud, as they hadn't done since their honeymoon days.

Next morning the doctor said that Henry had a tumor and must be operated on, and then science could discover whether the tumor was "malignant" or "benign." Odd words, Laura thought. As if tumors were good and evil spirits. The doctor arranged for Henry to go to the hospital tonight and be operated on tomorrow morning. "The sooner the better, old man. Get it over with." At six o'clock they took a taxi to the hospital.

She sat in the waiting room for more than an hour, and then the nurse came and said she could see Henry, but she must go by nine-thirty so he could have a good night's rest. And there Henry was, in the narrow bed with the head raised, looking, not old, but washed and innocent like Ted when he had his tonsils out. Even his clean pajamas looked cleaner. His big gold watch ticked loudly on the bedside table. In the closet were Henry's clothes, waiting to be put on again. Clothes could wait forever. Such terrible things happened to people. God or no God, they got lumps in their sides and died. She sat down by the bed, near enough to touch Henry if he wanted her to.

"Well, gosh—it's a living room, ain't it?"

"Is there anybody you want me to call up?"

"Not till I'm out of the woods. Funny thing, Laura. There isn't anybody in the crowd I'd want to see right now. They're not the sort of people you want to see when you're—in trouble. Death embarrasses them. They're swell, but they don't want to be in at the death."

"You mustn't talk like that. Everything's going to be all right."

"Sure. Oh, sure. Everybody who hasn't a lump in his side is as bright as a monkey. They had an intern in here taking my case history. A mere kid. I swear his voice was changing. He had the nerve to wish me luck, as if surgery was a matter of luck." His voice trailed off and he turned his head away. "You better go home."

"If you really want me to."

He reached for her hand, gripped it hard. "No, stay. I'm—I'm not so good alone. I feel like the day you came to see me off on the boat, and you were waving from the pier and the big deep whistle was cutting right through me, and the distance between us was getting wider and wider. I'm saying a lot of words, Laura. What gets me is—this isn't words."

SHE smoothed his hand, the nervous hand that had written so many thousands of intelligent words.

"Something tells me it's cancer. And I've wasted my life. I haven't written what I meant to write, or said what I wanted to say. I should have written real things. Not words. I should have said something people could hang on to in a world like this. When things happen—like a lump in the side. Or worse things. . . . I'm afraid of death. Always have been. But I've managed not to think about it. And now ——"

"Henry, you aren't going to die."

"I don't want to be nothing, Laura. I don't want to be nothing! And I'm going to be. And I haven't a thing to take hold of!"

"What makes you so sure death is—nothing?"

"Don't give me that. Don't talk to me about heaven. I can't stand any soothing sirup."

She should tell Henry about the otherness. But it would be like trying to describe sunlight to a man who had never seen the sun. "Soothing sirup, Henry? Why should the deepest hope people have be soothing sirup? What have you against hope?"

"It stands to reason ——"

"Reason isn't the only way we have of finding out things. It's comparatively new, and it's faulty. It takes us only just so far. Then we leave it behind and go out to the frontier. Out of the dead-end street to where there's a lot of room."

"My dear"—his voice was indulgent—"frontier? Dead-end street?"

"The trouble is there aren't any words. People like me have got to beat out a whole new language. But it's something like this. Once, in school, I saw a paramecium through a microscope. He didn't have any mind, any sense, except the sense of touch. Well, there was once a time when the world was all parameciums, and nothing else. Anybody might have said then, if anybody had been around, that the world would always be nothing but parameciums, that it stood to reason there would never be a creature like man with his mind and his heart and his five senses. But there was hope for the world, even in those days; hope was true, and not despair. And hope is still true for the world, and all of us, now. Someday there will be people on this earth with far more sensitive minds and hearts than ours, and with more than five senses. And they'll look back on us as we look back on the paramecium."

"If you think you can cheer me up with talk on evolution ——"

"I'm not saying it right. But what I'm trying to say is—I believe, when man gets a sixth sense, it will be an awareness of something that is not man, of an otherness. I have known that otherness, Henry. Now and then. I can't describe it. I only know—it just comes over me. And when it comes over me, I'm sure that we aren't the only ones in the universe who think, or love, or suffer. There's Someone Else. Knowing us and waiting to be known by us."

He spoke so softly that she could scarcely hear him. "You really think so, Laura?"

"Every time we hope, we are thinking true, Henry. There is Someone. He means well by us."

"Means well? In a world like this one?"

"I still don't understand why we suffer, but I have a feeling that if we opened our eyes and looked, we'd see joy and sorrow and life and death all woven together. I think life and death are not so different, Henry. They're one coin with two faces. So when death comes to us—a long, long time from now—we'll find it very natural and we won't mind. Honestly, Henry, we won't mind."

"It's pleasant to hear." He shook his head. "Anyhow, it's pleasant to hear."

"I love you, Henry."

"I've meant to speak to you about that. Since all this happened. I've been afraid of love. I said you might spoil the children with your love. But maybe I was only afraid you would give all your love to them and have none left for me. I've distrusted love. And hope. But perhaps what I really distrusted was myself. I never thought I'd get anywhere, and I was surprised when I did."

"But you did get somewhere! You see, Henry? It's such a pity to live as if only the worst were true. Let's not live that way."

"You're really a very nice woman, Laura. If there were a God, I'd like Him to be half as nice as you."

The nurse came in and said Laura must go now. Laura stood up and kissed Henry on the lips.

"I meant to tell you about the key to my safe-deposit box, Laura. You'll need ——"

"I won't need anything."

All the way home in the taxi, she wept. He was like a child. Pathetic. It tore you apart to see pathos; it was worse than seeing pain. As she undressed, she felt deserted, forsaken. She had none of the faith that she had put into words at the hospital. There was, right now, no otherness. No One she trusted, no light. She hung her dress on a hanger; it was, at this moment, more real than God.

When she finally slept, her hand was stretched out toward Henry's bed. But no hand was clasped in hers. It was empty.

In his dreams, between sleep and waking, Job thought of going back to St. Simon's. It was mid-September, and he seemed no nearer the end of his search than he had been in June. He had received a two-week extension of his vacation "on account of illness." And the illness was very real.

Between sleep and waking . . . he dreamed that he was the sower going forth to sow, with his bag of good seed. And he met many people. But they all had knives and firebrands. And he said, "We must sow seed in the earth," but they laughed and put the torch to the earth. And then suddenly he saw his pulpit at St. Simon's. He went up into his pulpit, and the faces of his congregation were old and withered. Because the young and the strong did not come to St. Simon's. So he went on preaching to the old, and he told himself the young were arrogant. But then he saw that the church itself had grown arrogant. It must be humble again. It must learn to be a place where the young and the old might come and discover new light . . . a place of life and not death.

He dreamed that he was walking along a road with men carrying heavy burdens. And they met a man who said, "You are ape-born, a little better than the gorilla, but not much better, because you and the gorilla have so many traits in common." So the men with the burdens bent lower and they turned into ape-men, because men become what they are told that they are. And they ran out and made war.

And Job saw, too, in his dream, that a church could not be a house divided, running a mission downtown for one sort of people and a place uptown for another. And he dreamed of St. Simon's as a church free and open, with no pompous ushers, in cutaways and gray gloves, showing the regular customers to the place in the Lord's house that was theirs. A church with windows not "Sacred to the Memory of" but "Sacred to the Future of." And there, with uptown and downtown gathered together, he should tell all the people something—something old and wise and simple—but he could not think what it was.

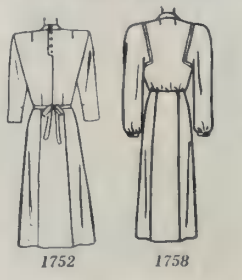
He woke. He was back in his bedroom at No. 12. And he knew no peace because he still had no faith, and unless he had faith his voice would be in the pulpit a fool's voice. Worse than that it might even be a sentimental baritone, with a reputation and a salary, crooning over the tragedy of mankind.

"I'm superstitious, Nick," Bliss said, dipping an oyster into the little red cup. "The more hell I have putting on my plays, the better they go over. That's why I wasn't worried about Don Bellamy's dropping out of the cast."

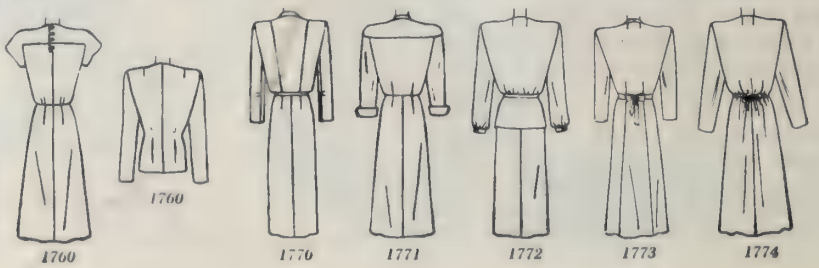
Nick stirred his potage. "Funny. Don was the one who had to pretend he had a nervous breakdown because he didn't have the nerve to face me at rehearsals. And Melita didn't go to him. She's staying at a hotel. I'm well rid of her. I was in a sort of slavery to her. Like somebody told me—I was worshiping idols."

"Mason's got to do more work on the last act. It needs sharpening up."

"I can leave my study door open all the time and nobody'll interrupt me. I'm a free man. I know who I am and what I want."



"The dialogue isn't quick enough. It wants to go snap, snap, snap."



"I wake up in the morning, all by myself, and I don't have to wonder how I'm going to please her. I can keep my mind right on my work. I'm lucky it happened. I was telling myself that this very morning when it seemed kind of quiet around the apartment."

"I'm glad you see it my way, Nick. I figure it'll be a smash last-act curtain when everybody piles on the train for Hoboken and you're left alone on the platform."

"She wasn't worth breaking my heart over. I knew it all along. And that made it worse. But at last I got the strength to tell her. The trouble is, life isn't like a play where you have one big moment, the climax, and then it's all settled. Life never winds up. After a big moment, you've got to keep on having the strength."

"It's our big chance. Just like we were the people in the play. I wouldn't say this to anybody but you, Nick, but if we could just show people they've got to decide what better world they want, or else—you know what I mean. I've got a boy in the Pacific."

"Somebody told me once that, if you go through a tough spot, you come out on the other side and are born again. With a whole new way of looking at life. Well, I guess that must have happened to me. I'm a free man and I don't waste any time thinking about Melita. That's all over."

"You're going to be great, Nick. You'll be the minister. Why, you're the minister already."

"What she does is none of my business now. I have plenty of time to think. It's amazing how much time there is when you're all by yourself. I've got my work, and there's nothing that gives a man so much satisfaction as his work."

Bliss looked at his watch. "I've got to run. You've been a big help, Nick. It's always a big help talking things over with you."

Nick signed the check and walked out into the blue smoky bitter air. Nowhere to go that he didn't want to go; no one to see that he didn't want to see. He was free. What more could he expect? A man couldn't have everything. Even if a man was born again, he couldn't have everything.

GLADYS could not believe it when the old man brought her the telegram late that Sunday afternoon when she was washing her hair. But when she saw Jake's name—"deeply regret" . . . "killed in action"—she had to believe it.

She tipped the old man a quarter, and then she thought how terrible it was to tip anybody for a telegram like this, but the old man was gone. She ran downstairs to the pay telephone and called the church. Reverend Primrose was there. She said, close to the mouthpiece, "It's Miss Foster. I've heard from—from the War Department. Could you come right down?"

She walked up and down the room, her hair, which wasn't quite dry, the dark red hair Jake liked so much, hanging around her shoulders, till Reverend Primrose came. His face was putty color and his black clothes and his collar looked, all of a sudden, too big for him.

"It could be a mistake, Miss Foster. You mustn't lose hope."

She sat on the bed, holding on hard to the brass ball of a bedpost, and he sat in the lopsided wicker chair. "I hoped and I hoped, Reverend Primrose. Now I'm all out of hope."

He felt terrible. You could see that. He said, "Jake would want you to be brave."

It didn't sound real. Only the brass ball of the bedpost, hurting her hand, was real. And she felt kind of surprised to hear her own voice saying, "Look here, Reverend Primrose, I don't mean to be disrespectful, but what have you got to say to me now?"

He didn't speak quick and easy, like he did when he talked about wages and hours. He spoke slow, with his eyes looking down at his shoes. "Jake and you love each other. People who love can never lose each other."

"Don't say things I can't understand." Her voice was high and shaking. "This time you've got to talk so's I know what you mean. You said Jake was safe. You told me to pray, and I've been praying. You said God would help me. What did you kid me for? It's no good kidding people, Reverend Primrose."

His face was white as a bedsheet. "I never told you that praying would keep Jake from—being killed. You and tens of thousands of women have prayed their men would come back, and they won't come back," he said and he put his hand over his eyes, like they hurt him. "Religion can't explain the suffering in the world. What religion can offer is the Hand of God to help people through."

"What is God? I gotta know."

"We believe in God," he told her. "We know He exists. But with our mortal minds we cannot exactly know what He is. We must have faith ——"

"Don't know," she whispered. "I never figured you didn't know. What are you a minister for if you don't know?"

"You've had a dreadful shock, Miss Foster. You need—and I need—the grace of God. We cannot expect to understand His ways, but we believe He is a great creative Force, the Mind in which we live and move ——"

"But I never wanted a Force like you talk about, or a Mind. I wanted that Good Shepherd. I wanted somebody who cared for Jake!"

"God does care for Jake."

"Then why didn't he keep Jake alive? If He could of saved Jake and didn't, He's not good. And if He couldn't save Jake, what use is He?"

"We must have faith. If you trust God ——"

"Trust God? I did trust God, and look what happened! Now you want me to trust some more. Like I was a sucker. When I joined the church, you seemed to know a lot about God. You even said He was interested in wages and hours and wanted His kingdom to come on earth with the social gospel. But now—when Jake is dead—all of a sudden you don't know who God is or what He does with people."

Some ask why mankind in general do not compose one nation, and are not contented to speak one language, to live under the same laws, and agree among themselves to have the same customs and the same worship; whilst I, seeing how contrary are their minds, their tastes and sentiments, wonder to see even seven or eight persons living under the same walls under one roof and making a single family.

—JEAN DE LA BRUYÈRE.

"Faith and trust are all we have, Miss Foster. In times like these our faith is tested. Try to believe that God has a good plan for the world. Jake is part of that plan. Because Jake, and others like him, died, we will have a better world, with peace and justice and brotherhood."

"What do I care? Jake's dead. He won't come back and we won't have our children. They're dead too. They was killed before they was born. God didn't plan for them, did He? We wanted three children. And they was swell children. They wanted to get born. What do I care about a better world where Jake and our children are dead?"

"Words are no good to you now. You can't see beyond your own grief. That's only natural. But later on you'll understand that Jake died to make the world a better place for other people's children."

"No. That's what they say on the radio, but it isn't true. Jake died because he was healthy and they drafted him. He didn't mean to die. What he wanted was to come back to me and have our children."

"You'll see Jake again. All we can do now is hold fast and have faith. And try to make a world where no more young men will die ——"

"Oh, stop that! You're always talking about the world, getting out of talking about me. When will I see Jake again? That's what I want to know."

"In God's good time."

"You're just guessing." She stood up. "You don't know any more than I do about who God is or where Jake is. I'm not going to hope any more. I'm through with your God who didn't keep Jake alive. Please go 'way, Reverend Primrose. Maybe you meant it all right, and maybe you was just a big gyp. But please go 'way." She fell sobbing on the bed. "I wanted a God I could know. I wanted a God who was close to me and who'd tell me, 'Gladys, it's hard now, but it's going to be fine.' Please go 'way Reverend Primrose! You haven't got a real thing to say!"

The doctor told Laura, early that hollow-eyed morning in the hospital waiting room, that the tumor was benign and that Henry had come through the operation beautifully. When the doctor had gone and Laura was alone in the ugly room, she felt that otherness again. All around her. Blessing. Glowing. Reassuring. She had meant, if God came to her again, to take Him by the throat and ask Him why He had not been with her when she needed Him. But now all the questions fell silent in her heart. She simply drew a long breath and moved her stakes a little farther out into the unknown. She forgave the ways of God to her, as He forgave her ways to Him.

The sparrow fell. "Make a note of that," said God. But the sparrow kept on falling.

Next Sunday Job Tatum must be in the pulpit of St. Simon's. He could not help feeling a sort of expectant exhilaration at the thought. Lately, whenever Job had visited his study, it had not seemed strange, but familiar again, like a place where he belonged.

It was Thursday evening and he was on his way to the Briggses' house. During the summer, the Briggses had decided to move to California. St. Simon's could ill afford to lose such pillars, Job told himself. And not on account of their money. On account of their faith, the persistent faith that kept on believing, no matter what.

The Briggses were in the midst of crates and barrels. The house, stripped of draperies and furniture, seemed curiously small and unimportant. And the Briggses, like their house, were shrunk. Mr. Briggs did not have that round well-filled importance; Mrs. Briggs' feet were those of an old woman, uncertain, turned inward, and there was a constant small tremor in her hands.

"We made up our minds rather suddenly," Mr. Briggs said. "But we wanted to see you before we went."

"I'll miss you," Job said earnestly. And he was not so sure now about the Briggses being stuffed shirts and this room being airless. Last June it was he who had been airless.

Mrs. Briggs said, "We're sorry to go. This is where Abner grew up. I'm always seeing him lying in front of the fire, or climbing the stairs."

"We planned to hold on to this house for his sake," Mr. Briggs said. "But it's like mother said. We're always seeing him. His—his passing hit us harder as time went on. I guess at first we just didn't take it in. But California has no memories for us. We won't be seeing the boy everywhere. And it's a sort of place where old folks go."

THE Briggses wanted to be old, Job thought. He remembered how, after Ann's death, he had felt angry at his own youth and all the years he had to live. Too long. It had never stopped being too long.

"There's something I wanted to tell you." Mr. Briggs went on. "I never meant to, but"—he stopped and rubbed his knees, head bent, like a confused child—"but now that Abner's gone I'd like you to know. And mother here would like you to know." He stopped and went on. "You never knew who it was that saw you, down there, when you were a small boy washing dishes for the Salvation Army, and had them send you off to boarding school. Well ——"

When Job had seen, on that dark street, the face of the Salvation Army woman, he had thought it was the face of God. And now, as he looked, Mr. Briggs' tired furrowed face seemed to have the same sort of glory. "You," he said, stupid with surprise. "You!" He felt very small. Like the child in the dark street. "I can't tell you ——" he began huskily.

Mr. Briggs said, "Don't thank me. I got a big kick out of it. I was just a kid myself, with my father's money burning in my pockets. You were standing on a chair with an apron around your neck, wiping dishes, and I thought I'd give you a chance. But I didn't imagine you'd—many's the time I've sat in my pew while you were preaching and thought, 'I helped to put him there.' I never meant to tell you. But now Abner's gone—I wanted to feel that you knew you were carrying on for us. It'll give mother and me a lot of comfort to think that every Sunday—well, I can't put it into words, but you know, son, you know."

"Let me tell you something," the older woman said to the younger. "It is something that, if I had known when I was young, would have saved me a lot of fear. I'm going to die, and I have found out that, when your time comes to die, someone, on the other side, takes your hand. Who is it? I don't know. But it's someone."

IT was past two o'clock when Job finally reached his room at No. 12. He did not undress, but lay on his back on the bed, his hands folded behind his head. Humble. Shaken. "Help me, Ann," he said aloud.

There was no use trying to sleep. At four he dressed and went out into the hall. There was a light under the door of Dell's flat. And suddenly he knew that he wanted to see Dell. Humble and shaken, he needed to tell her what had happened to him tonight and hear her voice answering. Ann did not answer.

Softly he knocked on her door, and it opened. Dell was wearing her blue dress and her hair was in yellow braids so that she looked like a child.

"Come in," she said. "Everyone is asleep. But I didn't want to sleep. I've just been sitting here drinking coffee."

They sat down by the kitchen table. She gave him coffee and he drank it. For a long while he did not say a word. With Dell, he had always been free to speak or be silent, as he pleased. She was, as Ann had been, capable of silence.

"Remember, Dell, you said once that I could never help anyone until I became what I really was. You've known all along that I was not really Mr. Tatum who worked down at the docks. Now I want to say who I really am. I'm a minister."

He was not prepared for the sudden joy in her face. "A priest?"

"A Protestant minister. I'm going back to my work. This is my last night here."

"It's wonderful your being with me now. You don't know how wonderful—how I've wanted someone like you to—to hear my confession. I used to be a Catholic. When—things happened—I went away from the church. I've wanted to go back and confess, but I was ashamed."

"That's just the time we all should go back—when we are ashamed."

"Bless me, Father, for I have sinned," she said quickly and made the sign of the cross. "Pete," she said. "He's not my child. Liz is his mother. When our mother died I promised to look out for Liz. I promised. And when Liz told me she was going to have a baby she said she'd kill herself. She could never stand people saying what they would say about her. I was older. I could stand it better. So I took her out to the country, and when Pete was born we moved here and I said he was mine. Liz didn't mean any harm. But she's not the kind to bear things."

He said, "Yes. I can see how it would be."

"And then she met Bert. And it was so important for Bert not to know. Or he never would have married her. Bert is what she wants—even if ——"

"I know."

"I have a hard time remembering Pete isn't my son. He seems so—mine. And Liz has a hard time remembering too. When I

Now the bends are O. K. for some girls, but not for Helen—who suffers from shrinkage of the dress. And the pity of it is that it takes only a "Sanforized" label to make such a picture impossible! For a dress tagged "Sanforized" never shrinks out of fit—and out of style!

"The Goop-Droop"

Here's another unlovely picture—which is, alas, all too common. Eleanor bought a dress that was too big, to allow for shrinkage. Silly girl! So much smarter to buy a dress with a "Sanforized" label in your right size. For a "Sanforized" dress that fits when you buy it has its good lines for keeps! So whenever you're shopping, whatever you want to pay—look for the "Sanforized" label on every washable cotton!

"The Tug-Tugger"

Particularly noticeable on street cars and busses. Ethel's legs haven't grown longer—her dress got shorter. Wouldn't have happened if she'd looked for a "Sanforized" label, and made sure her pretty dress would stay pretty—no matter how many times she washed it!

told her I wanted to move out into the country with Pete, she didn't care. She was glad." She bowed her head. "Bless me, Father, for I have sinned."

He said, "You are forgiven if you just ask. We are all in the midst of forgiveness."

"But there's something more I want to say. While everything on my heart is being said. I want to thank God for a wonderful life. I have been so blessed. Sometimes I've wondered why I was picked out to be so blessed."

He could not keep the sound of wonder from his voice. "It seems as if you had been given so little. How have you been blessed?"

"I have had Pete. As if I were his real mother. I never could be thankful enough for Pete."

Here in this room, evil and even death had no meaning. Only good quickened this quiet air.

"Dell," he said, "I've heard your confession. Will you hear mine? I have sinned. A heavy sin. A sin of the heart. My eyes have been blinded to the good in others. I did not accept it. So I ceased to believe in goodness. I saw drab lives, but I did not see, at their center, a light. When I saw goodness in you, Dell, I did not understand it. I was even irritated by it. When, as a minister, I came to know people's sins, I thought I knew the truth about them. But the real truth about them—you might call it God's truth—was their courage, their love, their sacrifice. But people told me their sins. And I listened. This would be a better world if we told each other our good, and we all listened."

"You're saying what I've always thought. Only—only I didn't know how to say it."

"All summer long, I've been learning about people. And now tonight, with some friends of mine uptown, and with you, I have begun to see what I always should have seen. There is a spirit in man. It persists. No matter how much evil there may be. No matter what darkness surrounds us. Compassion and forgiveness and hope and justice and truth—these things abide in the human spirit. Deeply. Eternally. Indestructibly. They abide. I once told you there was a mystery at the heart of man. The mystery is goodness."

"Those things—compassion and hope and all the rest—if we believe in them, we believe in God. Isn't that how it is, Mr. Tatum?"

"Yes," he said. "It's as simple—and as deep—as that."

He walked over to the window and raised the shade. The night had gone, and the great sun was rising, and it was morning. It was morning in his heart.

O little town of Bethlehem, how still we see thee lie;
Above thy deep and dreamless sleep, the silent stars go by;
Yet in thy dark streets shineth the everlasting light;
The hopes and fears of all the years are met in thee tonight.

It was Christmas Eve. Laura had put wreaths in the windows, wreaths with artificial leaves and berries which stood the apartment climate better than real ones. She was ready to trim the tree. She had got out the boxes of ornaments, saved year after year. The colored balls. The tinsel. The icicles. The strings of lights. A tiny crimson bird that had been the children's favorite. And now Betsy's child might see, someday, the little bird.

HENRY had always been indulgent about Christmas. He always said, like so many others, "Christmas is for children." But that was not true. Because children could not understand Christmas. They had only the toys. When they grew older, they would have Christmas. The more adult you were, the more you had Christmas. Because then you saw, underneath its gay lighted surface, its solemn splendor.

While shepherds watched their flocks by night,
All seated on the ground,
The angel of the Lord came down,
And glory shone around.

Henry had recovered from the operation, but he still liked to take it easy. He was sitting on the sofa by the fire in his cherry-colored dressing gown, talking to Sam and Zorella. And they were trying a concoction of champagne and coffee mixed. Sam and Zorella had come to see Henry because they were always restless on Christmas Eve.

"It irritates me to have everybody act so happy," Zorella said. "Give me a good old snarl."

SAM poured himself another drink. "Christmas only goes to show you what a hold legends have on the man in the street. Tell you what. Let's us make a legend that will last two thousand years."

"That reminds me," Henry said, "of when I was in the hospital." Sam and Zorella settled back with a hunted look, but Henry did not notice. He liked to talk about the hospital experience, in a proud voice, as if it had been a trip to the moon from which he, by his own daring and ingenuity, had returned. "One of the interns told me that people in a hospital often go right back to infantilism. Now you take the night before my operation ——"

"You take it," Sam mumbled. "Hospitals give me the creeps."

"That's just it, Sam. Our horror of hospitals drives us right back into childhood. That night before I was operated on—well, is my face red every time I think of all the kid talk I spilled! I wouldn't have believed I had it in me. Laura was a good sport, though. She saw how I felt and she pulled some guff herself. But if she won't tell what I said, I won't tell what she said. How about it, Laura?"

She was fastening the crimson bird onto the tree. "I meant it all, Henry."

Henry said, "Good old Laura. The most astonishing things go on in her brain. Come here and give me a kiss."

As she kissed him, Laura thought it was now that Henry had reverted to childhood. To the small boy who pretended he had not been afraid of the dark.

"I figure that most people who go through something tough have an experience like mine," Henry said. "They want to hear myths and legends."

Laura hung and looped the tree with color. The voices of Henry and Sam and Zorella wove themselves into a familiar braid. But now it did not matter. She was not alone. She had no poverty of spirit. She could not, no matter what happened, get outside of the love of God. She was a woman sitting in the sun, and not straining after the sun but letting it reach her, and knowing it would. She had trimmed the tree. She pressed the switch. The lights came on.

Joy to the world, the Lord is come;
Let earth receive her King;
Let every heart prepare Him room,
And Heaven and Nature sing ——

Commuters to Heaven opened on Christmas Eve. Everybody was there, a mink-and-white-tie audience. Even before the curtain went up, the theater had the generous air of success which experienced playgoers can feel clear out to the sidewalk. It was going to be good. The scenery was handsome; the lights worked perfectly in the tricky blackouts. And as for the actors—during Act II, a woman in the third row said to her husband, "You know, I think that man who's starring must have been a minister sometime in his life."

During the intermission between Act II and Act III, everyone backstage was holding his breath. So far, so good. The play was building. But there was still Act III. The climax. And it was so easy to destroy a play, especially a play like this one.

Nick, in his dressing room, was poised on the peak of a wave that was about to break. In another hour, this role would be created. After tonight, he would not have this surge under him again. The thought gave him a lonely feeling. Leaning toward the mirror, he thought of the time he had watched Melita at her mirror and read to her out of the New Testament: "'Thy faith hath made thee whole.'" It seemed like a long time ago. And those words had never been quite clear to him. A normal man wasn't meant to keep his mind on that stuff. It was all right for a minister.

"Watch it, Mr. Romney," his dresser said. "You're takin' it all too serious. You just relax, Mr. Romney. You was swell."

Nick hardly heard. The Mayor. Would the Mayor blow up in Act III? "Do you think the crowd is getting it?"

"Take it easy. Sure the crowd is getting it. You're laying 'em in the aisles. And say, Mr. Romney, your wife's here. In the third row. She's lookin' swell."

Nick's thought about the Mayor snapped like the stem of a glass. His breath choking in his throat, he looked through the peephole in the curtain. Almost everyone else had gone out into the lobby, but Melita was still in her place, alone. In the blue dress, with the blue veil in her hair. Smiling to herself, as she had used to smile before she said, "Come here, Nick."

On stage again, he had the crowd with him. The old trouper in him could tell. They were feeling what they should feel. They were here, in the play, with him. He was careful not to look at Melita. And now he had almost reached the place where he quoted from the Sermon on the Mount. At rehearsals he had remembered it every time.

DOROTHY SAYS GOOD-BY TO GOOD OLD U. S. A.

New York City.

My dear Bruce and Beatrice: This is my last week in the Aladdin's cave that is New York. It has been a wonderful time for me, and I can't thank you all enough for all your kindness to this escaped prisoner. I wish I had kept a diary to read over the wood ash when I get back.

An extraordinary thing happened the other day, when I took a taxi to Radio City. The taxi driver said, "English, aren't you?" for some reason getting the idea at once, the way they seem to out here! He went on to tell me he had been back only two months himself. He said he had liked it over there and had quite a good time on the whole. And when we got to my destination, and I asked him how much, delving among the quarters and things with buffaloes on them in my purse, ready to pay, he said, "Nothing to you. People were pretty good to me over there, and we owe quite a lot to England." If he hadn't driven off so quick I would probably have kissed him.

Later. In these last days I feel like the condemned man preparing his final banquet. What to take. What to leave. Whatever it is, how I shall regret it. Toys are especially hard to pass by, but so bulky. However, I have got two handsome dolls for prizes at the Rudgwick village school. One for the infants, one for the big girls. I have never forgotten seeing the children walking around nursing dolls, homemade with loving hands but little skill, and with the most appallingly ugly faces I have ever seen.

Must go and pack. Fortified by real orange juice, gorgeous meals and a lot of fun, I return to the forms, directions and other snags of my native land. Queer how fond one is of one's own country in spite of all. However uncomfortable. But one thing I know: if I hadn't happened to have been born English, I would have plumped for America. American women seem to me to have a wonderful time. If I were a young woman, I'd be out there, angling around. It has always been my conviction that the ideal marriage is between the English girl who has been brought up to Know Her Place, which is certainly not the first one in this man's land of England, and the American boy. She expects so little. He is convinced it is up to him to do so much. The recipe sounds to me a good one. It will be interesting to see how the many war marriages turn out.

Love and thanks to you all,

DOROTHY BLACK.

Homeward bound.

My dear Bruce and Beatrice: We are off down the Hudson, in a blizzard. This is a one-time luxury liner, on which I have sailed before, but her own maker would not know her. I am berthed in a sort of gals' dormitory with sixteen bunks in it—but mercifully we are only four. There is nowhere to hang anything, and all day long the loud-speaker blares sinister messages to unknown soldiers: "Will Private Baffle go at once to the orderly room." We are called by reveille. We are put to bed by the last post. To bed, on a hard straw mattress, with two cement pillows. Maybe I would pity myself if I didn't realize it was sixteen boys who packed into the same space, and wrestled with the taps that are so strangely reluctant to turn on.

I hated seeing the sky line fade, and the familiar statue wave me a last farewell. To Liberty indeed, as far as we all are concerned, I'm afraid.

Later. We had a film show last night, in the course of which a small child I had never seen before appeared from nowhere, worming her way down the row of seats. I said, "Are you looking for someone?" She replied, "I am looking for you," climbed into my lap and went to sleep. When her mother removed her, she bawled. It's quite a while since I felt so flattered.

Later. England's coast line is just heaving up out of the murk, and the orange juice and the fun and games seem very far away. It is bitterly cold, and of course it is raining.

Later. The Duke's Cottage. Rudgwick. Was it really me who went to sea, and shopped without coupons, and had all that fun? It seems just a bit like a dream. Icicles hang from every tree, and the silence is broken by shattering sneezes. A sheaf of bills awaited me—and that is life! Eric, the pony boy, has grown another foot and bought a razor. The garden looks wonderful, thanks to the constant attention of Wm. Tullett, who has had things all his own way, and moved trees just where he thought he would. A new beehive has been erected, and painted white, in the bees' garden city at the end of the orchard.

At the moment I am beginning to realize there is a lot to be said for central heating. But I shall get used to it, and no doubt my nose will thaw out in time.

Love to you all, DOROTHY.

FOR THAT YOUNG, YOUNG LOOK

But it had always brought a pang. And now, suddenly, everyone was speaking too fast . . . too fast. . . . The play hurtled on, revolving like a great wheel. Here ——

"Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." He drew a long breath. "Blessed are they that mourn ——"

His mind went blank. The gray wool filled it. The stage whirled. The floor tipped under his feet. In a moment, the play would tip too. He thought very fast. Blessed are they that mourn. Why? He did not know. He had no idea. But now he heard the prompter. "For they shall be comforted," Nick said, and the moment was saved. But he never would believe that line. When he heard the prompter's voice, he had given up trying to believe it.

The play was over. Nick took a dozen curtain calls. But as soon as he could get away from the crowd in the dressing room, he was going to find Melita. He must have been crazy these past months. Out of his head with the strain of putting on the play. That stuff about wanting to know who he was and getting born again—that was morbid, unhealthy. Now that the strain was over, he could see what a fool he had been. He was going to get Melita and take her home. The play was a success. He had created the role. He could store it now with all the other roles in Cain's warehouse.

And yet he could not help remembering the time when he had been running the mile in the school track meet, and, just before the finish, his breath had given out and he had dropped from the race.

Christmas Eve. Gladys Foster was sitting on her bed, her forehead pressed against the cold brass knob of the bedpost. If she could just sit here like this, not even going out to eat, she would not have to see any more of Christmas. There seemed to be so much Christmas.

She was ashamed of what she had said to Reverend Primrose. After all, he believed what he said; he could not help it if he was wrong. He didn't deserve for anybody to speak to him like that. Mrs. Mitrou said he had telephoned a couple of times, and once he even came to the house, but she was too tired to talk to him. Even her voice these days was kind of tired.

There was a knock on the door. She didn't answer. If it was any of the boarders wanting to say something about Christmas, please couldn't they go away and leave her alone? The knock came again. Oh, well, better to answer than to keep hearing that noise. It was Mrs. Mitrou. With a letter.

Jake. The letter was from Jake. Her hands trembled so she could hardly open it. Perhaps—perhaps it would be dated after the day the telegram had said he was killed. Perhaps he wasn't killed. No. He had written it the day before. He had begun it: "I figure this will be my last letter for a while because I'm going to be plenty busy." She took the letter over to the bed. Maybe she would not read it all now. She could read a sentence every hour and make it last over into Christmas Day. This was her Christmas present from Jake. She ought not to hurry through it.

But she could not read it like that. She had to hurry through it.

"I've been thinking over what you said about praying for me, and I've come to believe there's a lot in it. Out here, a guy comes to understand a lot of stuff and see things different. I can't say it now, but when I come back, I'll tell you. I figure you'll get this letter sometime in December, I hope, I hope. So will you do me a favor? Probably you're going to do it anyhow, but I'm making sure. Will you go to the midnight Christmas service at that church you wrote me about? I'll be there. Whatever happens. I'll be there. So you be there. A guy doesn't want to be stood up."

It was ten minutes past eleven. But she could make it. If she hurried. She heard someone sobbing, but she was sure it couldn't be her. Because she was so happy. She felt strong, strong. She could of run ten miles; she could of climbed mountains. She put on the dress Jake had always liked. It wouldn't do for him to see her in strange clothes. She put on Jake's favorite hat and the coat with the raccoon collar he had seen a thousand times.

She ran downstairs. From the wreath on the front door she broke a sprig of holly and put it in her buttonhole. When she got on the bus, she said "Merry Christmas" to the driver, and she said it again to an old man who sat beside her, but he was asleep. The bus stopped three blocks from St. Simon's. She ran those three blocks, so as to be sure not to be late, and she did not feel the sidewalk under her feet at all, nor get out of breath. She was like a bird flying.

She was in time! The choir hadn't even gone up to the altar. And suddenly, right in the vestibule, she saw Jake. He was dressed in his battle uniform, helmet and all, and he had a sort of light around him, and the strange part of it was that he had three children with him, and they looked as if they were waiting for her too.

And then it seemed as if they weren't in the vestibule of St. Simon's, but in a place of their own, and the light grew brighter all around them.

"Why, Jake," she said. "These children—these are our children. We aren't going to miss nothing."

"Sure," he said. "No matter what happens, we aren't going to miss nothing."

"But, Jake," she said, and her heart was full of laughing and singing, "it's like we was in heaven!"

And then the light was gone and Jake was gone, and she was in the vestibule again. Instead of Jake, there stood Reverend Primrose, and she held fast to his hand, because, if she had not held fast, she would have fallen.

She said, "I seen ——"

"Yes?" he said, and smiled.

"Forgive me," she said. "Forgive me, Reverend Primrose."

Every pew in the church was taken. The pillars were wreathed with evergreen; there was holly at the windows Sacred to the Memory Of. At the Good Shepherd window. At the window which said, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden." Over the altar hung a star. And the altar itself was heaped with crimson flowers. Job Tatum knew that Dell and Pete were in the balcony. They were going to move to the country in April. He was making certain of that in a way that Dell would never find out.

The soprano was singing. Job looked down at all the faces. Miss Grooby, as usual, was in the front row. Miss Grooby had been afraid that God might strike the soprano dead in the middle of her solo, on account of her asking for more pay. But the soprano kept on singing. Beautifully. Miss Grooby's face was wreathed in her Christmas smile, but she looked tired. All the faces looked tired. They were in need.

Job remembered his dream of what he would do when he came back to St. Simon's. He had dreamed there was something wise and old and simple he must say to his people to answer their need. But he had not known what it was. Now, looking at the faces, he knew. It was the word that would comfort the sighing he had heard here in the pews at Easter, and down at the slum called No. 12, and here again on Christmas Eve.

The simple ancient word was "love." That was what he must say to his people. It was only through love that people came close to one another, and to God. In love, all virtue and all light were gathered. He bent his head. "Ann," he said, "if I had only learned, when you left me, to take the love in my heart for you and the child and give it to my people—but I did not." Then he looked down at the weariness and the need of all the faces, and he yearned over his people, as he had used to yearn over his own sorrow.

It was time for him to speak. He mounted the pulpit. He had planned to tell his people that Christianity held out the only hope that democracy would conquer totalitarianism now and forever. He had taken his text from Isaiah: "And the government shall be upon his shoulders: and his name shall be called Wonderful." But on this Christmas Eve, it seemed as though they should hear, instead, the first words which the angel had spoken to the shepherds: "Fear not."

He opened the Bible on the pulpit to the new text: "Fear not, for unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord."

The words shone in the silence of the church. And they were all true.

It was always high noon, where the sun stood. The sun did not know darkness. But the earth, beneath the sun, rolling out of the shadow, was creating Christmas morning.

HUSBAND TO SPARE

again at the unrolling scenery. What an unpleasant young man! If there had been any place else in the train to sit, she would have moved, but she knew every inch was filled. People were even sitting in the washrooms.

She must have dozed off, because the next thing she knew a conductor was announcing something in a loud voice. She caught only the last few words.

"What did he say?"

The captain still had his eyes closed, but he answered her, speaking with evident enjoyment. "You'll have to get off, I'm afraid. They're taking off the day coaches and clearing out a lot of the passengers. Only women who are officers' wives, traveling with their husbands, can stay on. Tough luck."

At first she thought he was lying to her, trying to get rid of her, but she saw people getting things together and she overheard their conversations and knew it was true.

"Oh, my!" she said in a half whisper.

She would be too late for her job. Craig had said it was important for her to be there on time, and now goodness knew when she could get there, and they wouldn't hold it for her. He'd had trouble enough wangling it, when there had been applicants they could interview in person, and now they would take one of those applicants instead of her.

She would have to go home. She couldn't go to New York without a job, without a prospect of one. She had very little money, and she hadn't bought a return ticket because she hadn't expected to go back—well, anyway, for years. She could just about manage a ticket home from here.

"Oh, my!"

The captain looked down at her with an expression that might almost have been concern. "What's the matter?" he inquired. "Are you ill?"

She looked back at him, and just then he turned so that a ray of sunlight from the window caught the bars on his shoulder and flashed blindingly into her eyes. She blinked them shut. When she opened them again, her face was flushed and she was almost as breathless as though she had been running.

"Listen," she said. "Listen, captain, you have to help me."

"Oh-oh." He put up his hand as though to ward her off. "I know that opening too well. Whatever it is, count me out. I told you—I want nothing to do with women."

She bent her head as though to hide tears, all the while thinking furiously. She had to get him to do it. She had to. She couldn't give up all her dreams—the job, New York, Craig, everything. She had to find some way ——

"Crying's no good either," he said. "I hate crying. If you need help of some kind, why not find a nice, willing fellow who loves women and doesn't mind getting snared? There are lots of them. Why pick on me?"

"That's just it," she said. "I could trust you, where I couldn't take a chance on a man who likes women. Even my—husband would approve of you."

He looked at her warily, but she thought she could see the little muscles around his mouth relax, and when he spoke his voice had lost its edge. "You're married?"

She nodded. "I'm on my way to meet my husband now. He's been in Germany, and I haven't seen him for three years. Now—now I have to get off the train; goodness knows when I can get another one. I'll be too late." She turned her head away and repeated in a whisper, "Too late," and then wondered tensely whether she had overdone it.

But he asked, "What do you mean? Won't he wait?"

She shook her head slowly. "He has to be hospitalized. We were to have three days together first." She got up, smiling wanly. "Well, I suppose I'd better get ready to get off."

"Wait a minute." His gray eyes were very nice, she thought, when they were not cold or wary. "When you wanted me to help you, did you —— I mean, if you—well, what I want to say is, that if you said you were my wife—I'm an officer, you see—and then they'd have to let you stay on."

Her heart returned to its proper place, high in her chest. She shook the hair out of her eyes and looked up at him with her electric-blue eyes and grinned. "Oh, that would be wonderful! Would you really do it?" She sat down with a little sigh. "I don't know how to thank you."

He smiled for the first time, and the smile broke up the austerity of his tanned face and made it appear younger, more boyish. "It's little enough to do for a brother in arms," he said. "Somebody's bound to have half of my section, and it might as well be you. I ought to add that what I said before—about women, I mean"—he was stammering again; he was actually rather shy, she thought—"it's only when they're looking for husbands that I—well, don't like them. Once they're married—well ——"

"You mean," she offered helpfully, "that you have no objection to me, now that you know I have a husband? I'm glad."

The conductor was calling the next station, repeating his instructions about those who had to get off. Then he began going from seat to seat, making individual inquiries.

"Listen," Dinah whispered. "Who am I?"

"Who are you?" the captain echoed.

"What's my name?" she said impatiently. "Mrs.—what?"

"Oh." He laughed. "You won't like it, I'm afraid. It's Wickenbush—Ronald Wickenbush. I had nothing to do with it, you understand."

The conductor was upon them now. Dinah was certain his stare was suspicious, and she felt herself getting warm under his sharp old eyes. "You two," he said gruffly. "Man and wife, are you?"

Captain Wickenbush only nodded, but Dinah felt that some more emphatic response was required. "Oh, yes indeed," she said. "This is my husband, and I'm Mrs. Wickenbush. Unusual name, isn't it? But then what's in a name, as I've always said to Ronnie."

She stopped, because the conductor's stare had sharpened, and she knew suddenly that she had said too much, that she had sounded nervous and unconvincing. She smiled up at him weakly, waiting for him to tell her he knew she was lying, but all at once his heavy, wrinkled face broke up into a toothy grin.

"Newlyweds, eh?" His hoarse whisper was meant to be confiding, but it reached every corner of the crowded car. Necks craned to look. Men beamed at them fatuously. Women made soft little oh and ah sounds. In front of them, the stout woman who had given up her seat became aware that her protégés were the center of some kind of pleasant excitement. She turned and gave them her beaming smile and said, "Yes-s-s, yes-s-s, sit with friends."

"Now you've done it," Captain Wickenbush muttered, the pleasant look gone from his face again. "If you'd just relaxed, it would all have been so simple. We tell the conductor we're married—he has to take our word for it, so he can't put you off the train—and that's that. Everybody in the car didn't have to ——" He broke off with a disgusted click of his tongue. "Women!"

"Listen here, Captain Wickenbush ——" Dinah began angrily, with emphasis on the ridiculous name, but her words were drowned out by a sudden blare of music. A soldier had taken a harmonica out of his pocket and begun to play, to be joined instantly by two others, one with a sweet potato and another with paper wrapped around a comb. Slowly, majestically and loudly they played the Wedding March from Lohengrin.

Even the fat woman understood this universal language. She turned around again nodding so vigorously that her large head seemed about to fall from her neck. "Yes-s-s," she said. "Yes-s-s," as though to indicate that she had known it all the time.

Dinah glanced fearfully at Captain Wickenbush, and just then he glanced at her. It was like the moment when they had found themselves unexpectedly and forcefully sitting together. Simultaneously they began to laugh, his hearty roar mingling with her little giggle, and finally he had to proffer her his big handkerchief again.

"Well!" she said. "Well! Thank heaven you have a sense of humor!"

"It is funny," he admitted, "and I guess you couldn't really help it. That conductor was just a romantic old fool."

"Romance," Dinah said, "can be very nice. It's too bad you're so sour on it."

"You would be, too, in my shoes."

She looked up at him with an interest that was not at all simulated. That was another of Dinah's charms. She was genuinely interested in almost everything about almost everyone. "Tell me," she said. And she kept her eyes riveted on his face while he talked, nodding sympathetically. She really did begin to understand. It was enough to make a man unpleasant to women and suspicious of them, when as long ago as grammar school they had been after him for his money.

"She had blond corkscrew curls and blue eyes, and I'm sure she was an insipid little fool, but I thought she was wonderful," he said. "And then I overheard her best friend asking her what on earth she saw in me, or words to that effect, and she said, 'My goodness, he gets the biggest allowance of any boy in the class.'"

It had been that way ever since, and when he got into uniform it was worse. Every girl he met wanted to marry a captain with a large private income, and that's all they had to know about him. They didn't care that he was a nice, warmhearted fellow who had always been good to his mother and handy around the house. He might as well have been one large dollar sign. Now that the war was over he was going home to Connecticut and buy a farm and devote himself to the simple life, with women strictly excluded.

"You've met the wrong girls," Dinah said. "They're not all like that. You've just been unlucky."

"Maybe I have." His gray eyes smiled pleasantly. "Maybe I have at that. You, for instance, rushing to be with your husband for a few days ——" He looked at her budget-shop suit, its commonplace lines enhanced by her neat, small figure. "I'll bet he's not rich, either."

"No-o," she said. "No, of course not."

He asked her questions then. What was her husband like? How long had they been married? What—with a laugh—was her name, anyway?

"My husband." She thought of Craig, who called her "darling" now. "He's very nice. In high school we were just pals. We played tennis together and picnicked—things like that—and were never serious or sentimental. Then he enlisted and went away."

She made the rest of it up—how they had been married on his first furlough, three years ago, in the little white church, and how they had had only two weeks together before he went away. While she was telling it she felt that it was true. She could see herself in her wedding dress, looking up at Craig; she could see herself in his arms at that last farewell; she could feel the love, the tenderness, the anguish of parting.

"Don't cry," Ronald Wickenbush said softly. "Here." He handed her his big handkerchief. "You keep this."

She dried her eyes and then smiled again, stuffing the handkerchief into her suit pocket. "You still don't know my name. It's Dinah."

"Hello, Dinah."

Then she had to add the final touch of reality. "Dinah Ware, it is. Mrs. Craig Ware."

She had scarcely finished saying it when a porter came through with a telegram, shouting, "Miss Dinah Gormley. Telegram for Miss Dinah Gormley." And she had called to him and taken the yellow envelope before she realized what she had done. She turned around to the captain, smiling feebly.

"It must be from someone who doesn't know I'm married."

"That's hardly likely. Anyone who knows you well enough to know you're on this train would certainly know you're married, after three years."

"Well you see, in business I always used my maiden name on my job. They didn't approve of married women."

He gave a disgusted snort, but his face cleared. "Old-fashioned nonsense!" he said. "Well, aren't you going to read it?"

"Read it? Yes—yes, of course." The message was from Craig, telling her that he could hardly wait till she arrived, darling, and for a moment she forgot everything in her dream of the moment when she would get off the train.

"Not bad news, I hope?"

"Just from my old boss. Nothing important, Captain Wickenbush."

"Better call me Ronnie." He grinned. "The other's a little formal for a husband, don't you think?"

THEY went to the dining car at the first call, prepared to wait interminably to be served, but the crowd parted for them at once and a smiling steward showed them to a table. It was occupied, but one couple arose immediately at their approach—a huge, red-faced Irish lieutenant, and the fat woman from their own car.

"Sit with friend," she said. "Yes-s-s, yes-s-s, sit with friend." She waddled out, the lieutenant following silently in her wake, and Dinah and Ronnie stared after them.

"I'd have sworn," Dinah said, "that she didn't have that lieutenant in tow before. Do you think ——"

"Why, Dinah! All these years we've been married, and I never knew till now what a suspicious nature you have!" He grinned at her, and she thought how nice he was, now that he was no longer wary of her.

When they got back to the Pullman car which had been assigned to them, the porter was making up the berths.

"You'll take the lower, of course," Ronnie said.

"Oh, no, I couldn't. It wouldn't be fair. After all ——"

He gave her a warning glance, and whispered, "What kind of husband do you think would let his wife sleep in the upper berth?" Aloud he said, "That's sweet of you, dear, but my asthma's not bothering me at all tonight. I'll be fine in the upper."

"Mistuh cap'n." The porter turned around, a gray Pullman blanket over his white-sleeved arm, a wide grin on his face. "Ain't no use to argue, suh. Train's so crowded, even with all those people off, you an' the missus gotta double up. You has both got de uppah."

"Why should we have the upper?" Ronnie inquired indignantly. "Who has the lower?"

"A majah an' his wife, suh." He moved off, shaking his head and chuckling, and Ronnie turned to Dinah, still indignant.

"These majors," he said. "They get the best of ——"

"Ronnie," Dinah broke in gently, "did you hear what he said? He said we'd have to—to—double up!"

"Certainly I heard him. That's what ——" He stopped, and realization broke over his face. "Oh-oh," he said. "Oh-oh."

"WHAT'LL I do now? I just have to think of something." She frowned in deep concentration. Finally her face brightened. "Look—what about our fat friend? If they're not really married either, they're in the same fix we are. If you could find that lieutenant, and sort of feel him out ——"

"That's a great idea. I'll look for him right away." He smiled, his gray eyes crinkling nicely in his lean face. "Though there won't be much room for you, in a berth with that lady!"

He went off, and Dinah looked after him for a moment and thought that it was really a shame to deceive him like this. When she had thought he was mean and conceited and impossible, it had seemed a good joke on him. She had even considered telling him at the end of the trip, as a laugh, but now she could never tell him. If he knew he would think she was just like all the other awful girls, going to any lengths to get what she wanted. If she didn't tell him, he would always think well of her and remember their trip with pleasure, and no one would be any the worse for it. Still, she didn't like deceiving him. Not any more. He was too nice.

"Telegram!" It was the chuckling porter, back again. "Telegram for Miss Dinah Gormley."

She took it, giving the porter a very undignified wink along with his tip. "It's a secret marriage," she confided. "Nobody knows it yet. That's why the telegram says 'Miss.'"

The message was from Craig again, more ardent than the previous one, more liberally sprinkled with "darlings." He had changed in the Army, she thought. He had certainly lost his shyness. She had been very impatient with him sometimes, knowing how he felt about her, yet never hearing him tell her. The evening he had gone away, she had tried to help him say it, but he had stammered and blushed and gone without telling her. She had written a few impersonal letters and received a few noncommittal V-mail answers, and then suddenly he was back and she was his darling.

"Your fat lady friend," a grim voice said, "does not care to share her berth with you."

Dinah looked up, startled, into the gray eyes of Ronnie Wickenbush. Rather, she looked up into one of his gray eyes. The other was tightly shut, obviously not by inclination, but perforce, and the puffy skin around it was turning rapidly purple.

Dinah gasped. "The lieutenant?"

Ronnie shook his head. "Not the lieutenant. I wish it had been. I'd have had him court-martialed for striking a superior officer." Suddenly the anger went out of his voice and he grinned. "I've never seen anybody get so red in the face and still control himself."

"But how ——"

"He had his wife hit me—oh, yes, she's his wife all right. I made some jocular crack about their not being married, and he got redder than the Soviet flag and gabbled something to her in some foreign language. She grinned and nodded as if her head were coming off, the way she does, said, 'Yes-s-s, yes-s-s,' and socked me in the eye."

Dinah giggled. She did not mean to giggle, because actually she felt very sorry about the whole thing. It was awful that he should have been hurt trying to help her, especially when she was a fraud and a phony. But the picture of the fat woman nodding and grinning and meanwhile hitting him in the eye was too much for her.

"Oh, my," she gasped. "I'm sorry—I'm s-so—s-sorry. Oh, my, oh, my!" Finally she got her breath, dabbed at her eyes with his handkerchief, and looked up at him guiltily. He was smiling, his eye bright with laughter. "You know," she said, smiling back, "I've never met a man before who could see the fun in a joke on himself."

"I've never met a girl before," he said quickly, "with whom I could see the fun in so many things."

Then he turned dark red under his tan, and there was a short, embarrassed silence which Dinah filled with activity. She took his handkerchief and soaked it in cold water and then came back and had him hold it to his eye. She made herself very busy with powder and lipstick, looking at her small, pert face in the mirror and wishing suddenly that it was glamorous instead of merely cute.

"Well," Ronnie said finally, "what are we going to do now?"

She gave him a grateful glance for the we. "I'll just have to sit up. I can go into the ladies' room, maybe, and sleep in a chair."

"You'll do nothing of the sort. A fine sight you'd be to greet your husband, with hollows under your eyes." He reached for a pillow. "Go on now, you climb up there and go to sleep. I'll be all right. After all, I'm used to foxholes—anything better is luxury."

It was useless to argue with him, and besides, the passengers who had already retired were hissing vicious shushes at them. She climbed into the berth, set her little alarm clock for three-thirty, and fell asleep almost at once.

When the alarm went off, she was dreaming that she was in New York, and that she had to get up to go to work. She sat up at once, with a vague feeling of disquiet, and then felt unaccountably pleased to see where she was. She smiled to herself as she rang for the porter.

"Yes, missus?" he whispered, from the other side of the green curtain. "You want de ladder?"

"Yes, and I'd like to see my husband too. Will you see if you can find him?"

After what seemed a long time she heard a discreet knock on the metal edge of the berth. She looked out from between the curtains, and saw Ronnie, looking sleepy and disheveled and, with his now very black eye, faintly disreputable. Somehow, looking at him, she felt a way that she had never felt before. She felt maternal.

"You wanted to see me?" he whispered.

"It's your turn to sleep now. Don't argue. I'm coming down and you are coming up." Without waiting for him to answer, she slid out and down the ladder, clutching her robe around her in one of those vain attempts at modesty in a Pullman. "Go ahead now," she urged, when she was standing beside him. "You look exhausted."

"I just woke up," he said. "I was ——"

"Quiet!" The major in the lower berth stuck out his head and glared at them. A funny look came over his face, which Dinah could not make out, and Ronnie disappeared hastily up the ladder.

Dinah repaired to the ladies' room. It was empty, and there was a long, leather-covered seat which would make a fair bed for a little thing like Dinah. She made a pillow of several folded towels and lay down. It was hard, but she thought she could doze a little.

"Miss—I'm sorry, miss." Someone was shaking her. She sat up, and saw a small, plump woman in white bending over her. "This is where I sleep, miss," she said. "I'm the stewardess. I'm sorry—they told me everybody had a berth this trip."

"It's my husband," Dinah murmured sleepily, reciting the explanation she had planned if anyone questioned her. "He snores."

She staggered out, and stood uncertainly in the aisle, wondering where to go next. As she stood there, the romantically minded conductor came by, ignoring her according to the night etiquette of Pullmans. He stopped at the end of the car, opened a narrow closet in the wall, and was concerning himself solely with his conductor's business when Dinah's chuckling porter came along with another telegram.

"Miss Dinah Gormley?" he inquired, loudly enough for the conductor to hear. The conductor stopped what he was doing and turned around, watching her take the telegram and read it.

What she read was so incredible, so calamitous, so absolutely impossible that she scarcely knew what she was saying. "Stage name," she muttered to the conductor, forgetting that she had given a different explanation to the porter. "Stage people never use 'Mrs.'"

She began to walk dazedly out of the car. "Your berth's in the other direction," the conductor told her. She turned around and walked to her own car, and was about to go on through, looking for another place to sleep, when she saw the conductor had followed her. She stood near the berth, waiting for him to pass, but he smiled at her, got the ladder from a near-by berth, and held it for her to climb up. There was nothing for it but to go ahead.

A comedian asked Mark Twain to write five good jokes for him. He offered a fee of fifty dollars but was refused. The humorist argued: "It can't be done, for we both would get bad reputations. Anybody who knows that I have as much as fifty dollars may consider me a thief. You certainly will be called one if you have five good jokes in your act."

She got gingerly inside, staying as close to the edge of the berth as she could, until she thought the conductor was gone. She did not even look at Ronnie, feeling that by not looking at him she was making the whole thing more impersonal, but even in her discomfort she was aware that he did not snore. She was as quiet as possible, so as not to wake him, and as soon as she thought it was safe she climbed down again.

The porter stood there as she descended, waiting for the ladder. He grinned at her knowingly. "Don't you fret, missus," he whispered. "By mawnin' he won't be mad no mo'. You could maybe sleep comf'table in de baggage car, like he did."

"Which way is the baggage car?"

He pointed, still grinning. Then, as though no longer able to contain himself, he whispered admiringly, "You sho' give him one beautiful shiner, for such a small lady."

She stared after him, and now she understood the major's funny look, and despite the fact that disaster had overtaken her, it struck her as hilarious that she should be suspected of socking her new husband in the eye. She began to giggle, standing right there in the aisle between the berths, and before long she was joined by a familiar chuckle that grew into a suppressed roar. All along the line, angry faces appeared and voices hissed for quiet.

A hand came out from between the curtains of the upper berth, proffering a large handkerchief. A moment later Ronnie himself appeared, fully dressed. "Your turn," he whispered. "I've had enough sleep."

"So have I. I'm going to get dressed too."

"I'll wait for you in the observation car."

Breakfast with Ronnie, after the night's vicissitudes, held a peculiar intimacy. She knew, now, without his telling her, that he had been awake while she sat uncomfortably on the edge of the berth, waiting for the conductor to pass, and she thought it was very

Bring on the SHORT RIBS

How to Braise Short Ribs

Tender, juicy meat, with layers of crisp brown fat—and all the rich, fine flavor of good beef . . . that's the beauty of braising, when you do it to beef short ribs.

Here's how: Ask your meat-man to cut the short ribs into individual squares.

Season with salt and pepper. (Sprinkle with flour, for a richer brown.)

Brown meat slowly on all sides in hot fat.

Add a small amount of water. Cover tightly. Cook over low heat on top of range for about 2½ hours.

30-45 minutes before meat is done, add vegetables such as potatoes, onions, carrots, parsnips, celery.

Continue cooking until meat and vegetables are tender.

Other beef cuts to braise: pot roast, Swiss steak, flank steak, ox joints.

A new term has come into the American vocabulary regarding meat. It is amino (a-mee-no) acids.

What are aminos? They're what proteins are made of. There are ten essential aminos which the body must have to repair tissues, regenerate blood and build resistance to infection.

During World War II, meat (containing all ten of the essential aminos) became the centerpiece of meals for convalescing fighters.

This new knowledge of the "building" properties of meat under emergency conditions is further proof that we are right in liking meat for our own normal everyday selves.

tactful of him to pretend to be asleep. She thought he was wonderful about the black eye too. He had never once, not since the very beginning, blamed her for anything that had happened. He had just laughed and been a good sport and made her problem his own, and she thought it was wonderful. Now it was almost as though they were really newly married, having breakfast together.

Ronnie was playing it up for the benefit of the other passengers. "Pass me the jelly, dear. . . . Have another cup of coffee, darling." His tender looks were part of the act, of course. Still ——

For three hours, out in the observation car, they had talked. You can learn a lot about people in three hours alone, speeding through the darkness, watching the dawn break and the sun come up. You can become very friendly, and feel as if you had known each other a very long time. You might even look at each other tenderly, and mean it.

But all that would be over soon. In her pocket Dinah had a telegram that changed everything. Soon, in a few hours, Ronnie's look would change to that cold distaste with which he had first glanced at her. Soon everything was going to be awful. The telegram said:

CANNOT WAIT FLYING TO RICHMOND JOINING YOUR TRAIN THERE DARLING.

In a little while Ronnie would know Craig was not her husband—that he was not about to be hospitalized—that he was not even a soldier any more. He would know she had told him the most terrible lies, and he would despise her. She had hoped to leave him as a friend, perhaps to invite him to visit when she and Craig were married, but now there was no hope of that.

It would be better if she told him beforehand, tried to soften the blow a little. She kept trying to tell him, but it was no use. The words would not come. Every time she tried to say them, other words came out instead. And then the conductor was shouting, "Richmond! Fifteen-minute stopover. Richmond!"—and it was too late.

The train had scarcely stopped when a man in a gray pin-striped suit with a conservative tie came into the car, looked around quickly, and rushed down the aisle to her. He said, "Dinah! Darling!" holding out his hands, and she felt queer, embarrassed, as though a stranger were approaching her with words of endearment. It was ridiculous, of course. This was Craig, with whom she had gone to school, whom she expected to marry. A bigger, more mature, more assured Craig, but still the man she had known almost always. "It's wonderful to see you, darling," he said. "Wonderful! I had hoped to get a seat on this train, but it was impossible, even"—he laughed deprecatingly—"with influence. But I've arranged for you to fly back with me, darling."

She wished he wouldn't keep calling her "darling"—not, anyway, with Ronnie sitting right there. She had been pretending to be Ronnie's wife for—well, it was only hours, of course, but it seemed much longer, and she had gone through so much with him. She felt a little the way she thought a woman must feel when her husband discovers another man making love to her.

And then Ronnie's voice asked quietly, "Is this your husband?" and she saw how terribly mixed up she was. Because it was Craig who was going to discover that there was another man around—Craig to whom explanations had to be made. Of course Ronnie was in the dark about certain things, too, but it didn't really matter. She would never see Ronnie again, and she was going to spend the rest of her life with Craig.

She shivered a little, and looked from one to the other, wondering what to say, how to begin, and in the meantime Craig asked, "Who's this?"

"Captain Wickenbush," she said, and she didn't think it sounded unusual; she thought it was a name with character, a name you wouldn't forget—not ever, not as long as you lived. "He's been—wonderful."

Craig looked at Ronnie and frowned. "Wonderful," he repeated. Dinah tried to remember whether he had been bright in school, but she couldn't. She couldn't, really, remember anything important about him at all.

"It was like this," she said, and then she told him all about it—but she was not really telling it to Craig; she was reliving it, chuckling over the fat lady, smiling tenderly over the hours in the observation car.

When she had finished, he was still looking at Ronnie and frowning. He had not laughed once. It would be awful, she thought, to spend your whole life with a man who had no sense of humor.

"You won't want me any more," she said suddenly, not knowing she was going to say it, not planning it at all. "I was—in his berth with him."

Ronnie stood up. "Look here," he said. "Say, look here, you weren't—that is, you make it sound—what I mean is, I don't want to come between husband and ——"

"He's not my husband," Dinah burst in, and as she said it a feeling of relief flooded over her. "I'm not married. I just told you all that so you'd help me, because I knew you wouldn't if you thought I was single and you might get involved in something. I wanted to go to New York. I wanted to meet—Craig. At least I thought I did. Now I don't care if I never see New York or—or ——" She stopped, because Ronnie hated tears, and after a minute went on quietly: "I'll get off the train now. I'll get a job in Richmond and work until I have enough money to get back home."

Craig was still frowning. "I don't get it," he said. "I don't—get it. You wouldn't do anything wrong, Dinah."

She smiled at him. "Thank you, Craig, but you can't really know what I'd do. We don't really know each other at all."

"What are you talking about?" The frown on his broad, handsome face grew puzzled. "We've known each other almost all our lives."

"Sometimes," she said, "you can know a person better after one day than you can know another person after a lifetime. It all depends"—she stopped, and then added in a low voice—"upon the person."

Craig looked at her, and then he looked at Ronnie. "Oh," he said. "Well"—he took out a handkerchief and wiped his forehead—"well, I guess I'll be going along then. Good-by, Dinah. Good-by, Captain—Crackenbush."

"Wickenbush," she corrected.

"Does it matter?"

She looked after him pityingly. She hoped he would find a nice girl, serious-minded but not too sensitive. Does it matter, indeed!

Finally she put on her coat and stood up, keeping her eyes away from Ronnie. "I'm going too," she said. "As soon as I'm sure Craig is off the train."

Ronnie did not answer. It struck her that he had not spoken for a long time. Maybe he had fainted. In alarm, she turned and looked at him. He was sitting with his head against the back of the seat, staring at the ceiling of the car, a beatific expression on his face. Presently he began to speak in a dreamy, faraway voice.

"She isn't married," he said. "She isn't married. Did you hear that, Ronnie, my lad? She isn't married."

Dinah stood staring down at him for a minute. Then she sighed and took off her coat and sat down beside him again. "Keep it quiet, please," she said comfortably. "I'm not supposed to be on this train unless I'm married to an officer."

"We could fix that," he said, still dreamily. "We certainly could fix that."

WE SHOOK THE FAMILY TREE

the Wicked Old Queen had prepared for me, and had fallen on a conveniently placed stretcher, dead. In the next scene the seven little dwarfs, played by sturdy little boys from the fourth grade, were to pick up the lifeless Snow White on the stretcher and carry her mournfully across stage. Unfortunately, one of the little boys stepped smack on my hair as they lifted the stretcher with me, the corpse, on it. As they kept lifting, I knew I was being scalped. Funeral procession or no, I came to life with a roar of pain.

"Hey, get your feet off my hair," I yelled.

The seven little dwarfs were so startled at this resurrection from the dead that they dropped me with a bang and stood there dumbly. I sat up and felt my backside gingerly, to see if I was hurt.

From the wings my third-grade teacher was whispering "Hildegarde, you're dead."

This was sheer wishful thinking on her part, because I was at the moment berating the seven little dwarfs for dropping me. Then I lay down dead again, and we proceeded with the funeral procession, while the audience cheered resoundingly.

My father told mother afterward that he'd love to see me as Little Eva. "Imagine what Hildegarde could do in that scene where Little Eva goes to heaven," he said. My mother just shuddered.

On the afternoon of April 6, 1917, my brother Bobby and I were playing hopscotch on the front walk, when a newsboy came up Buffalo Street. Usually he folded our copy of the Franklin Herald into a neat, tight square and threw it so that it landed right on the door mat on our front porch. On this day, instead of throwing the paper, he handed it to me all spread out.

"The President's declared war," he said. "Watch us knock that old Kaiser galley west."

I ran into the house to tell mother the big news. She was upstairs bathing my baby sister. When I waved the newspaper, she hauled Sally out of the tub, rolled her in a towel and jounced her absent-mindedly on one arm, while she read the headlines.

"Those Germans," she said. "Poor Mr. Wilson." As one of the few Democrats in Franklin, my mother had a fierce, protective love for the President.

I would like to be able to say that I, too, recognized Wilson's greatness then, and that in the next anxious months I followed the war battle by battle, as my parents did, on maps pinned up on the living-room wall. But at the age of eight I viewed the whole thing as an exciting new game, with words like Big Bertha, cooties and Hun to savor on my tongue.

I was proud of the way my parents were working for the war effort. My father was one of the volunteers who canvassed the town to sell Liberty Bonds. Almost every day he brought my brother and me a Thrift Stamp, and while he talked to mother before dinner Bobby and I would lie on our stomachs on the floor, pasting the stamps into our books.

If the war itself is hazy in my memory, certainly the coming of the Armistice struck with such force that I'll never forget it, mainly because of the unexpected part I played in the day's events. A month or so before it came, one of the older boys in the neighborhood had let me tag along when he went down to the wooden shack in an alley behind the Franklin Herald building, to get his daily stack of newspapers to sell. When I went home, I couldn't talk of anything else.

"Can I sell papers like Harry?" I asked.

"Not can I. May I," mother corrected me automatically. She said that it wouldn't be nice for a little girl to sell newspapers.

When she went upstairs to put Sally to bed, I switched the attack to my father, who was trying to read the paper. After I'd hung all over his chair coaxing, he looked up and said jovially, "Maybe you can sell papers the day the war ends." Then he went back to his reading. As far as I was concerned, this was as good as a promise, and, like the elephant, I had a deadly memory.

When the news finally came, on a sunny November afternoon, all schools were closed because of Spanish influenza, and I was out in the yard supposedly keeping an eye on Bobby. Mother ran down the back steps and hugged both of us.

"The war's over," she said. "Your father just telephoned."

Some wily instinct had warned me not to tell mother about my plans for selling papers. After she'd gone around the corner I ran upstairs and got nineteen cents I'd been saving up for a binge at the annual Sunday-school picnic. Then I told Bobby I was going downtown to buy him some candy. Surprised and pleased, Bobby agreed happily to sit on the front steps until I came back.

I have probably never covered three blocks as fast as I did that day, on my way to the wooden shack in the alley. When I got there, at least a dozen boys were waiting for their papers. I plunked my nineteen cents on the counter.

"Please, I want that many papers," I said to the man behind the stand.

There was so much noisy confusion that he must have started to hand out my papers without even noticing me. Suddenly he looked right at me, astonished. "Who you buyin' these for?"

"Me," I said faintly.

He seemed stunned. "Girls can't sell papers." He pushed my money back. I stood there miserably, looking up at him. Perhaps it was my dogged, silent suffering that wore him down. "Whose kid are you?"

I murmured my name.

"Is Cliff Dolson your daddy?" He sounded incredulous.

My voice came out in a hoarse, eager croak. "He said I could sell papers the day the war ended."

"Aw, let the kid have some papers," a tall, red-haired boy said. "Who says girls can't sell papers?" There were more shouts of "C'mon, give her the papers. We've got to get goin'."

The man fingered a pile of Heralds. "It's against the rules to sell them to her," he said. He sounded really sorry.

The red-haired boy turned to me. "Here, kid, give me your money." He took my nineteen cents and shoved it across the counter. "Listen, this is my money and it's not against the rules to sell me, is it?"

The man said "We-el-l-l—no." As the red-haired boy put the pile of papers into my arms, the man grinned and said "Anything to please a lady." He wished me luck, and I thanked him radiantly.

"Come on, kid," the red-haired boy told me. He and four other boys escorted me through the alley to Liberty Street. By that time the entire block was jammed with shouting, happy people, but the boys formed a sort of flying wedge, to get me across the street in front of the Exchange Bank. "This is where you stand and sell," my red-haired patron said. "It's the best place in town."

It was my first experience with man's generosity to co-workers of the opposite sex, and nothing has ever happened since to disillusion me about their tactics—in business, that is. As I stood there with the five boys that day, I must have been the proudest child in Pennsylvania.

"Don't forget to yell," the red-haired boy told me. "Just holler 'Armistice—read all about the Armistice.'" He said that if I wanted anything, he'd be a half block away.

After all the boys had gone, I stood in a flushed, dreamy fever of excitement. Even if I'd remembered the newsboy's advice to holler, I was much too overcome by the bedlam to raise my voice. There were church bells ringing and factory whistles tooting continuously. A group of high-school students formed a snake dance and weaved down the street, yelling. Somewhere behind me, firecrackers were going off. I watched grownups hugging one another on the walk.

I must have stood there a half hour before I saw our next-door neighbor, Mr. Sheasley, come out of the bank. I called to him, suddenly mindful of my role as newsboy, "Will you buy a paper from me?"

He took a paper, handed me a dime, and then seemed to realize for the first time who I was. "Well, if it isn't Hildegarde," he said. "How's business?"

I explained shyly that he was my first customer whereupon he grabbed another of my papers and waved it like a flag.

"Huns Quit!" he yelled, quoting the three-inch headline.

Men began to reach for the papers, handing me quarters and dimes and dollar bills. The red-haired boy had loaned me money to make change, but when I tried to give it to my customers, they waved the money away. Everybody must have felt that a little girl selling papers was one of the gay, crazy things that could be expected to happen on Armistice Day.

When all my Heralds were gone, I ran to the corner to ask the red-haired boy what to do. He gave me ten of his papers, and whistled in amazement when I hauled a fistful of bills and silver out of my coat pocket. "Gosh, kid, you're rich." He seemed as pleased about it as I was.

There must have been another wonderful, dizzying hour while I stood there in front of the bank, handing out papers and collecting more money than I had ever seen in my life. Several of the newsboys brought me more Heralds, and I paid them nonchalantly from the money stuffing my pockets.

It must have been almost five o'clock when I saw my father coming up Liberty Street through the thinning crowd. "Father," I called. "Look, father, I'm selling papers."

I have never seen my father so dumfounded.

"You said I could," I reminded him. "You said I could the day the war ended."

When he'd recovered his wind, my father said, "Well, we'd better go home now."

I let out such a howl of protest that he took me into Hambro's Ice Cream Parlor for a dish of vanilla ice cream. When I saw the candy behind the glass case, I remembered my new wealth and invested lavishly in gumdrops for Bobby.

In the excitement of my home-coming, nobody had the heart to scold me, and Bobby was even allowed to eat gumdrops before dinner while I babbled on to mother about selling papers. As nearly as I can remember, she said, "It's a wonderful historic day, and this is something to remember all your life." When she asked me to promise never to sell papers again, I agreed readily.

It was two years after the Armistice when mother saw The House. My Grandmother Brown, a lively, beautiful old lady, was visiting us at the time, and she and mother discovered it one afternoon when they were out walking. At dinner that night they tackled my father. The House was not only for sale, they said, but would cost even less than the one we now owned, so it would actually be a saving to move. They described how it sat on the hill at the top of Buffalo Street, and mother kept stressing the view, and how important it was to have room to breathe. Whenever my father asked what the house itself was like both mother and grandmother would say, "Oh, Cliff, it's so original."

My father, being a man, found this description rather ominous, but he consented amiably enough to go and see the house. A few weeks before, father had bought our first automobile. So on that Saturday afternoon we all piled into the car and chugged up the steep Buffalo Street hill to The House.

My mother and grandmother had been truthful in saying it was original. It was indeed. I can still hear my father's roar of pained surprise when he discovered there wasn't even a washstand, and that the bathroom, consisting of a tub and commode, was downstairs next to the kitchen. The house itself was about the size of the one we owned, but much older, solider and sweeter somehow, sitting there built into the hill with a beautiful view of the town below. To us children, it was the most fascinating, wonderful place we'd ever seen. To my father, it was a house without a furnace. With Bobby, Sally and me hanging on to him squealing "Oh, please" and my mother and Grandma Brown talking very fast and telling my father he must be blind not to see the marvelous possibilities, he spoke with the natural caution of a man who has learned when not to argue. His actual words were "We'll see."

The next evening, just after dinner, my mother sat reading the paper, and suddenly she squealed, "Oh, Cliff." Then she jumped up and kissed my father, who was looking very pleased with himself. What mother had read was an item saying "C. B. Dolson has bought the Evans property at the top of Buffalo Street Hill."

We moved into the house soon afterward, living for weeks in a lovely bedlam of carpenters knocking out partitions, electricians cursing as they tried to bore through solid hundred-year-old oak beams, and plumbers hauling the bathtub upstairs. Bobby and I spent most of our time exploring the woods behind. Our four-year-old sister spent her time with a child just her age, who was visiting our next-door neighbors, the Reads.

THE only trouble was that this new friend insisted on biting Sally at least once a day, often deep enough to draw blood. She never bit anybody else—just Sally—and I don't know quite why my sister stood for it, unless she sensed it was a literal translation of the "you look good enough to eat" line. (Even as a child Sally was quite a dish, with hair the color of goldfish and very white skin.) Anyway, the Reads were terribly mortified and they said couldn't we make Sally bite back? This Sally refused to do. Naturally, she howled every time Mary Katherine bit her, but she howled even more if she wasn't allowed to play with her. Finally Mrs. Read announced in desperation that she herself would bite Mary Katherine. She did, too, although it took a lot out of her. Mary Katherine was dumfounded at this tooth-for-a-tooth technique, but I must say she caught on very quickly. From then on, whenever she licked her lips and eyed Sally hungrily, her mother had only to say, "Remember, Mary Katherine," and Mary Katherine remembered all right. It wasn't what you'd call a voluntary embracing of the Golden Rule, but at least it was a Good Neighbor policy with teeth in it.

It was Nature, and not our neighbors, that presented the really tough problem. Mother said she didn't want a back yard that looked like everybody else's, although there was small danger of this, since few Franklinites went in for boulders and tall grass in landscaping. She gradually succeeded in transforming the back yard into one of the prettiest in town, with rock gardens, pools, little fir trees and a leveled-off terrace for eating.

The total transformation of the yard must have taken years, with the aid of my father and an occasional husband or nephew of whatever maid we had at the moment. As children, we weren't especially conscious of the process. Just after my father and mother had coddled along grass seed to get a velvety front lawn, we took to playing blindman's buff on that very spot. Some woman who had come to call told mother she mustn't let us trample over the new lawn, and mother said serenely, "But I'm more interested in raising children than grass."

Soon after moving up on the hill we'd been given an Airedale named Trouble, who would dash down between our sleds barking with uproarious gaiety and pretending to nip at our legs. He also had a lovable trick of following me into school if he were coaxed hard enough, and we never missed coaxing him.

Besides Trouble, the other addition to our household was a new baby brother, Jimmy, born in 1921. Since his arrival was not accompanied by any such memorable phenomenon as my having mumps, I can't remember much about it. When my teacher at school asked me what our new baby looked like, I said briefly, "He's vermilion," and let the matter rest there.

With Bobby, Sally and me to heckle him into action, our towheaded brother had very little time to lie in a crib and gurgle. At the age of two, he was not only a tireless walker, but could roar out a fine, thumping rendition of our favorite songs, including Onward, Christian Soldiers. Never having read the printed verses in a hymnbook, he had to depend upon his ear, and it was some time before anybody realized that while the rest of us sang the generally accepted version, "Christ the Royal Master leads against the foe," Jimmy was singing, with equal fervor, "Christ the Royal Master leans against the phone."

Another of Jimmy's accomplishments was his ability to stand on his head for remarkably long periods of time. Once mother complained to our friend and family physician, Doctor Mac Brown, that she didn't think it was good for a little boy to stand upside down so much. Doctor Brown said nonsense, no child could stand on his head long enough to matter.

The next time he came to see us, mother called my little brother in from the yard and said, "Jimmy, stand on your head."

Jimmy was rather surprised at this command, because mother had been trying to discourage his favorite stance. However, he obeyed happily, and not only stood on his head, but was well on his way to breaking all previous endurance records, with purpling face and bulging eyeballs, when Doctor Brown got so nervous he urged my brother to stop. "You see," mother said. Doctor Brown saw, all right. He had a nice little talk with Jimmy, and told him he must conserve his strength to grow up and be a good big football player. After that, Jimmy stood on his head on only very special occasions, or when somebody offered him a nickel.

—PUNCH.

Like my father, my brothers were ardent fishermen from the time they were old enough to recognize a night crawler from a crab. Even before they could actually accompany my father on his Saturday-afternoon fishing sprees, they were allowed the exquisite pleasure of digging for worms and filling a can full of bait.

One day Jimmy forgot to take the tin can up to the far corner of the back yard, where he was helping Bobby dig for bait. When he came back down to the house, looking like an angelic boy doll in his little cowboy suit and cowboy hat, my mother was entertaining several members of the Presbyterian Missionary Society on the sun porch. "Dear, take off your hat and say how do you do to the ladies," she told him. Jimmy said he didn't want to take off his hat. My mother persisted, although she was soon to regret it. When my brother finally removed his headgear, a live mass of fishing worms sat on his head, wriggling. Lacking a bait can, Jimmy had been keeping them safe and warm. As the worms wriggled down his head toward freedom, the ladies of the missionary society squealed like stuck pigs. Mother helped Jimmy pick up all the worms and get them into a can before she served her callers tea. She said there was no sense in wasting good bait, and besides, she didn't want my brother getting an inferiority complex.

Even as a baby, when Jimmy chased a butterfly he had the same rapt look Harpo Marx wears when he chases a blonde over tables. By the time he was four, his daily costume was a cowboy suit, plus a butterfly net with a bamboo handle six feet long, and an ether jar for chloroforming his catch. When benevolent old ladies stopped Jimmy on the street and asked him playfully what the jar was for, his reply was terse and to the point: "I kill butterflies."

Once mother decided he belonged in kindergarten, but after the first day Miss Wynne, the teacher in that haven for tots, sent him home with a note saying he was a child of Nature, and shouldn't be cooped up indoors. This was a graceful way of putting it, all right, and at least she didn't send my parents any bill for breakage.

Almost every Sunday, my father would suggest we take a little drive, and there would follow a touching scene, in which father tried to sell Jimmy on the idea of leaving Trouble, our Airedale, and the butterfly net at home. Nobody really expected anything to come of this, but I'll say for father he used lucid arguments, so lucid that they convinced everybody but Jimmy and the dog. Then off we'd go, with three of us wedged into the front seat, three in the rear, and Trouble bounding from lap to lap like a happy cow, or licking father's neck in gratitude for being included in the party. Meanwhile the butterfly net, protruding at length from a car window, called forth a frenzy of shouts from the drivers of passing cars.

Jimmy wasn't allowed to sit next to the door, because we had discovered that if he saw a butterfly, he'd go after it willy-nilly. This had become alarmingly clear when he was two, and had spotted a swallowtail as we drove down a country road. One minute our baby brother was with us, the next minute he wasn't. Upon realizing she was one child short, mother screamed, whereupon father pulled on the brakes and they both ran back to find Jimmy lying in the road. As they bent over him, frantically looking for signs of life, Jimmy sat up and said in a pleasant conversational tone, "I watched the wheels go round." He was very philosophical in his pursuit of Nature, and except for some cinder scratches, culled when he fell out of the car on his face, he was in dandy shape. After that, however, father had such trick safety catches put on the door handles to thwart Jimmy, that we could hardly get out of the car ourselves without a crowbar. As a further precaution, Jimmy had to sit in the middle, and a rope loop attached to his cowboy belt was fastened to mother's wrist.

On one of father's fishing expeditions, he had seen what he thought was an ideal picnic spot, and for weeks afterward, whenever we went driving, he kept looking for this Shangri-La in which to lay out our deviled eggs.

When we finally found the picnic spot, on a Fourth of July, it was all father had claimed: mossy places to sit, a stream for wading, and a lovely clump of trees. While mother and I were laying out the picnic, father took Sally and Bobby down to the stream, and Jimmy roamed around us with his butterfly net. It must have been at least ten minutes before mother realized he was missing. We called father and he started out with Bobby and me on a searching party. Just on the other side of the clump of trees, we came to a fenced-in field. My younger brother was inside, at the end nearest us, stalking a butterfly. Then we saw the bull. It was a very big bull, and it was standing there gazing at Jimmy. My father made a leap that would have done credit to Nijinsky, and was inside the field, grabbing Jimmy just as the bull decided to close in.

It's rather awkward to be chased by a bull when you're carrying a little boy, but father got back to the fence, tossed Jimmy over, and scrambled over himself at least three feet ahead of the horns. All of us thought it was a highly successful rescue—that is, all of us but Jimmy. He was furious because his butterfly net had been left behind in the field and wanted to go right back and get it. We had to promise that we'd fix him a new net and catch him a Luna moth before he'd calm down enough to eat a deviled egg.

Take them in fortified food—the delicious Ovaltine way!

Of course, the whole subject of vitamins is new. We learn more about them every day. And today, millions are learning a new and better way to take their extra vitamins—a more modern, more natural way that can do more good. Discarding earlier methods of taking vitamins alone, they now take them in fortified food!

For latest evidence shows that vitamins do not work alone. They work most effectively in combination with certain other food elements—which are absolutely necessary for best results.

This is the reason so many people are changing to Ovaltine. A specially-fortified supplementary food-drink, it contains, besides vitamins, nearly every precious food element needed for good health. Especially, those elements necessary for vitamin-effectiveness.

For example, Vitamin A needs protein for necessary work in cell-building. Vitamin $B_1$ and fuel-food also must act together for sparkling vitality. Vitamin D, Calcium and Phosphorus can't do their best work without each other. You get all of these in a glass of Ovaltine made with milk!

So why not turn to Ovaltine, as so many people are doing? If you're eating normal meals, including citrus fruit or tomatoes, 2 glasses of Ovaltine daily should give you all the extra amounts of vitamins and minerals you need for robust health.

Luna moths are huge, beautiful and a delicate opal green. On spring evenings, at least a dozen of the lovely things would flutter around the high-poled street lamp at the corner near our house. Jimmy used to go there at dusk, just before his bedtime, and stand, small and frustrated, looking up at the moths. One night he came home and went up to bed with suspicious quiet, before he'd even been clapped for.

The next day a policeman came up the hill to say somebody had thrown rocks and broken the street light. He wanted to know if we knew anything about it. When mother called Jimmy and began to cross-question him, the policeman chuckled.

"But a little boy like that couldn't throw a rock high enough to hit a street light," he said, patting Jimmy on the head.

My brother's professional pride was outraged. "Oh, yes, I could, too," he snapped, and rushed to the corner, where he grabbed a piece of brick lying in the road. Crash went the rest of the globe from the street lamp. Jimmy had proved his point.

We learned later that he thought if he put out the light, the Luna moths would come down to the ground within reach of a butterfly net. It was an interesting theory, but my parents discouraged any more active research of this type.

At least once a year father would vary his fishing activities by going frog hunting, and we were all fond of this annual treat of frogs' legs, or we were until Ursula entered our lives. Ursula was a hulking maiden who had come over from Germany the year before she came to work for us. Soon after she arrived, my father brought home a nice lot of frogs. Mother explained to Ursula that the legs were very edible, and told her to cook them for dinner. As we sat down at the table that evening, Ursula clumped into the dining room with a huge platter and set it down before my father. On it were arrayed six boiled frogs, heads and all, arranged in an ominously lifelike attitude, as if they were about to jump off the dish. Even Bobby looked queasily green, as he stared at Ursula's chef-d'œuvre. For once the Dolson appetites were nonplused. After the platter had been removed, we ate scrambled eggs listlessly. None of us has ever cared much for frog's legs since.

The only safe thing to do when you meet a new mother and baby is to say: "What a beautiful baby—and how well you're bringing him up!" —SADIE RUTHERFORD: Outspan.

Earl Liederman had a much more lasting influence on our lives than Ursula, although we never saw him in the flesh. That's a silly thing to say, because, in one way, we saw him only in the flesh. Every picture Bobby had of Mr. Liederman was a stunning expanse of muscular flesh as far as the eye could see, except for a modest patch of leopard skin, of course. He was one of the world's strongest men—physically, I mean—and he was Bobby's ideal. When Bobby first urged my parents to let him take the Earl Liederman correspondence course and become an iron-muscled man, mother and father thought it was funny. As the months wore on, and Bobby wore my parents down, in the slow, sure fashion of water dripping on rock, they ceased to see the humor. We had Earl Liederman for breakfast, lunch and dinner, and as warmed-over hash for Sunday-night supper. Bobby argued from the standpoint of health: "You want me to be brawny, don't you?" He also argued from the standpoint of efficiency: "If I built up my muscles like Earl Liederman, I could mow the whole lawn in ten minutes." This campaign started in June; he got the course for Christmas.

I think the lessons came every other week, but the one piece of equipment arrived by express, at the very beginning of the course. Earl Liederman called it tension cables, and the word "tension" had a certain rightness throughout this phase of our lives. The contraption itself consisted of two wooden handles with coil springs. Between these was stretched a long black rubber cable about as big in diameter as a child's finger. With a handle held in each fist, the cable was stretched as far as possible, on the same principle as pulling taffy, only tougher. As the pupil grew stronger and stretchier, he could add more and more cables, and Bobby claimed that Earl Liederman himself used ten. In addition, Mr. Liederman had suggested, in one of the lessons, that the pupil erect an iron gymnasium bar "in some unused spot," to practice chinning himself. Bobby and his friend, Tim Ely, rigged up a bar across the upstairs hall, a thoroughfare about as unused in our house as Broadway is in New York. The bar was enough higher than Bobby and Tim to give them a nice jumping range, but any tall and unwary visitor, traveling down the dusky narrow hall, ran the risk either of being decapitated by the bar or getting an awful conk on the head.

I'm still dazed and pleased to remember that Bobby's muscles actually did expand. At times you could almost see them growing, like morning-glory seeds. An early lesson had included a diagram of all the important muscles, explaining which ones to concentrate on, and Bobby's superior knowledge was hard on the rest of us. "You've neglected your deltoid, father," he'd explain kindly. "That's why your shoulders are narrow." Or grabbing Sally, a small, exquisitely made child, by the scruff of the neck, he'd say, "Just feel her trapezius. It's terrible." Sally would insist stoutly she didn't care, but all of us felt a bit sullen, like pygmies. Bobby was especially critical of my scrawny frame. "If you'd chin yourself ten times a day, Hildegarde," he'd say, "you'd have a bigger latissimus dorsi in no time. You'd get so you could even lift a horse." At that stage of my life, I wasn't much interested in lifting a horse, although I'll admit now it would be quite an effective parlor trick.

We of the inferior latissimus dorsi and trapezius were still human, and we couldn't help feeling a solid satisfaction when the Liederman method finally boomeranged on Bobby. It was Lesson No. 9 that egged him on to new and interesting usages for the tension cables. Instead of just holding a handle in each fist and stretching, Mr. Liederman explained it was also possible to put one handle on the floor, hold it there with the foot, and pull upward on the rubber cable with both hands. Bobby was pulling in this fashion, with all his new iron muscles, when his foot slipped. Immediately the released cable snapped up to hit him a forthright wallop on the nose. He went around for days in adhesive tape, but the only one of us who showed sympathy was Jimmy.

If I say we had a haunted Italian villa in Franklin, Pennsylvania, it sounds a wee bit far-fetched, but that's what we had, all right. The villa stood on a small hill that was an extension of Sixteenth Street, even higher-placed than our house, and about a quarter of a mile away. It had been built by the prodigal son of a family who wanted something refined out of crude oil. This son had traveled in Europe, and returned with Old World tastes, which may have become rather scrambled—Italian into French into Franklin—by the time he married and gave birth to the villa. It was of yellow-and-red stone. It had turrets, balconies, buttresses and everything but a drawbridge. The owner and his bride stayed in this thirty-room nest only a short time before they got homesick for the Old World—I can't imagine why. After they had departed for Paris, the villa (and I use the word so loosely it rattles) was empty for several years before the fire. Nobody knows how the fire started, and I myself was too young to remember anything about it.

When we moved up on the Sixteenth Street hill, the flames had long since transformed the place into what we called "the old burnt haunted house," the most perfect playground ever devised for green, growing Dolsons. What made it so perfect was that the interior was charred just enough, with unexpected holes in the floors, stairways half burned or blocked by fallen plaster, and yet many of the rooms still recognizable as rooms, some of them barely singed. These charms were so great we never fussed about the ghost, who was supposed to be female and wailing. Besides, it was rumored this lady wailed only at midnight, when the Dolsons were in bed.

When we first discovered this paradise, the year we moved up on the hill, Bobby and I assured mother it was a safe and altogether delightful spot for children. In spite of our descriptions, which made the place sound like the Kiddies' Korner of a Summer Kamp, mother insisted on going up with us to see for herself. On this tour of inspection, Bobby and Tim Ely took her in the side door that presented the best approach, because the holes burned in the floor there were quite a reasonable size. Once inside, Bobby, in a lord-of-the-manor way, led her into the least burned room, to the right of the entrance. We showed her around the rest of the downstairs, and she said, "Just don't go near the bad places in the floor, and always come in pairs, and be sure to bring the dog along." Then the tour of inspection was over.

Mother needn't have instructed us to visit the place only in pairs, because no child in the neighborhood had any desire to explore the burnt house alone. Even though Bobby and I quarreled like fiends at home, and especially at the dinner table, I always wanted him along when I went to the villa. Neither of us wanted Sally, because she was too little to jump over holes in the floor, but there were days when we had to lug her with us.

The downstairs of the burnt house never held our interest for long. It was just empty rooms, but the upstairs and the basement were rife with surprises. The basement was interesting because of the altar room. At least Tim Ely said it was an altar room. It had a small raised platform built under a stained-glass window, and on either side were heavy brown candlesticks almost as tall as Sally. The floor was inches deep in plaster, with hunks of the broken statues of saints lying around. For months we were content just to poke around in this rubble, and I am sorry to admit that it was I who finally got the idea of sacrificing Sally on the altar.

Bobby and Tim were agreeable because they thought it sounded like fun, and Sally was agreeable because she hadn't the foggiest notion what it meant to be sacrificed. She soon found out. The boys got a rope from somewhere, and we trussed Sally up like a fowl. Encouraged by her malleable acceptance of these bonds, we rolled her onto the altar, where she lay placidly, waiting. "Now what do we do?" Bobby asked. The boys looked at me expectantly, and so did Sally. I thought fast, and then said we had to offer food to the gods, along with our sister. For a Presbyterian, I had certainly picked up some rather pagan notions. The only food we had handy was peanut-butter sandwiches mother had fixed so that we might have our lunch in the woods that day. We placed these neatly around Sally, and added apples and cookies. It was quite an artistic effect: Sally in a little ruffled pinafore, hemmed in by rope and free lunch. The gods would have loved it.

HOWEVER, our labors had given us quite an appetite, and the more we looked at the peanut-butter sandwiches, the sweeter they seemed. When Bobby said he was hungry, and reached for a sandwich, there were no protesting voices. Let the gods rustle their own grub. We all reached, except Sally, whose arms were trussed to her sides.

When she complained about this, Tim said, "You're being sacrificed, so you aren't supposed to eat now." Sally immediately got red in the face, and Bobby remarked, "She's getting ready to scream."

I have already mentioned our red-haired sister's lung power as a baby, and the passing years had, if anything, trebled it. Just as she opened her mouth to let out a lulu, Bobby stuffed part of his sandwich into her mouth. After that, every time her face got threateningly red, we fed her another bite.

When the last cookie had been eaten, and Sally lay glutted and peaceful, like a fatted calf, the boys looked at me again. My knowledge of pagan rites was exhausted, but Tim suggested we ought to have a drop of blood on the altar. "I don't think we'd better prick Sally," Bobby said thoughtfully. By that time our sister was quietly napping; she has always had a talent for dropping off to sleep under circumstances that might bother some people. Tim agreed that rather than arouse our sacrificial victim by pricking her finger, Bobby might stick him, Tim, with a pin. It turned out that we had no pin, and by now we decided to let Sally finish her nap, and come back for her later.

The two boys and I wandered through the basement to the wine cellar. Here again, we Dolsons hadn't known it was a wine cellar till Tim explained that the odd wooden racks placed against the stone walls had originally held bottles. He said he'd seen a wine cellar in a movie once. On this day, we were just starting our usual game of climbing up the racks when the screams started.

"Sally must have waked up," Tim said.

This proved to be true. My sister had not only waked up, but had awakened to find herself lying trussed on an altar, for reasons that escaped her at the moment. By the time we got her untied, her blood pressure must have been 300 in the shade. It took a lot of fast talking to convince her that she shouldn't tell mother, and that the whole affair was a jolly secret to be shared by just the four of us.

As a final bribe, Bobby told Sally we'd take her up to the biggest balcony that jutted from one of the bedrooms. The rest of us had gone out there often, but we'd kept our little sister away, because the holes in the floor of that room were an ideal size for her to fall through. Now, while the boys jumped eagerly ahead of us, to get to the balcony and throw stones down, I inched across the bedroom, avoiding the charred gaps in the floor boards, and holding Sally by the hand. Just before Bobby and Tim reached the French doors opening onto the balcony, there was a crash that startled me so much I almost shoved Sally through a hole in the floor. In fact, I gripped her by the hair just in time.

"The balcony fell down," Bobby said. He and Tim peered over the edge with that bright, pleased interest they always showed for snakes and other acts of God. The balcony lay on the ground twenty feet below—a heap of jagged stone. Sally thought we'd done it to spite her, and was quite cross.

When we got home, her account of My Day, to mother, was simple but graphic. As a result, we weren't allowed to go near the place again, and within a year the villa had been torn down and carted away for junk—turrets, bathtubs, wine cellars and all.

Meanwhile, at home, we'd acquired a wine cellar of our own without knowing it. My father, who took only an occasional drink, had been charmed by Cousin Arthur's Prohibition recipe for homemade elderberry wine, and had decided to mix up a batch for himself. Mother said he could do it in the cellar, provided he didn't let the children know about it, because she didn't want us getting ideas into our heads. (I am piecing this part of the story together from things told me years later.) It's true that we children picked all the berries, but since we were laboring under the theory that they were for elderberry jelly, this couldn't have contaminated us much. Father was so shush-shush about the home brew that even Bobby and I had no notion anything was going on.

After the wine had been brewed, bottled and allowed to stand for a suitable interim, father invited Cousin Arthur to come down to the cellar and look at the furnace. Whispering together happily, the two men went to the far corner of the cellar, where father started to uncork a bottle of his brew. It must have been very buoyant stuff, because it immediately exploded all over my father's best gray suit. When he came to the living room he was a study in fuchsia tones, and very uncommunicative on his way upstairs. Both Bobby and I wanted to know what he'd spilled on his suit.

"Ink," father said. "I fell in it."

It didn't occur to me to wonder what father would be doing with a large open tub of pinkish-purple ink, accessible for falling into, but Bobby looked puzzled. "I never saw ink that ——" he began.

Mother said ominously, "It's ink, Bobby, and your father ought to be ashamed of himself." When we protested that it really wasn't father's fault if he'd fallen into the ink, mother said, "He should have looked where he was going." She sounded awfully mad.

Cousin Arthur thought up a brand-new place the piano hadn't been before, and by the time father had changed to another suit, mother was cheerful again.

"Cliff," she said, "Arthur suggested we move the piano to the center of the room and put a sofa against the back."

My father, for once, was downright enthusiastic about the idea. He and Cousin Art moved so much furniture that evening they must have been stiff for days afterward. Mother believed in striking while the ink was still wet.

Perhaps the surest way to tell when a female goes over the boundary from childhood into meaningful adolescence is to watch how long it takes her to get to bed at night. My own crossover, which could be summed up in our family as, "What on earth is Hildegarde doing in the bathroom?", must have occurred when I was a freshman in high school. Until then, I fell into bed dog-tired each night, after the briefest possible bout with toothbrush and washcloth. But once I'd become aware of the Body Beautiful, as portrayed in advertisements in women's magazines, my absorption was complete and my attitude highly optimistic. I, too, would be beautiful. I would also be flower-fresh, fastidious and dainty—a triple-threat virtue which was obviously prized above pearls by the entire male sex.

SOMEHOW, out of my dollar-a-week allowance, I managed to buy deodorants and mouth wash, and something called Nipso, guaranteed to remove excess hair from arms and legs, and make a man think "Oo-oo, what a flawless surface." It's true that I had no men, nor was I a particularly hairy child, having only a light yellow down on my angular appendages. Nevertheless, I applied the Nipso painstakingly in the bathroom one night, with Sally as my interested audience. I had noticed the stuff had a rather overpowering, sickish-sweet scent, but this was a minor drawback, considering the goal I had in mind. After Sally had been watching me for a few minutes, she began holding her nose. Finally she asked me to unlock the door and let her out.

"Don't you want to see me wash it off?" I asked, rather hurt.

"No," Sally said. "It smells funny."

In the next hour, as my father, mother and brothers followed their noses to the upstairs hall, there were far more detailed descriptions of just how Nipso affected the olfactory senses. Jimmy, being a simple child, merely said "Pugh" and went away. My father thought it was most like the odor of rotten eggs, but Bobby said no, it was more like a mouse that's been dead quite a while. Mother was more tactful, only remarking that Nipso obviously wasn't meant to be applied in a house people lived in. Since it certainly wasn't meant to be applied in a wooded dell, either, I was prevailed upon to throw the rest of the tube away.

I didn't mind too much, because I already had my eye on something that sounded far more fascinating. This was a miraculous substance called Beauty Clay, and every time I read about it in a magazine advertisement, the words enveloped me in rapture. I could well understand why a jar of the imported Beauty Clay cost $4.98. In fact, it was dirt cheap at the price, and my only problem was how to lay my hands on $4.98. Certainly I had no intention of enlisting financial support from my parents. For one thing, it was too much money; and for another thing, parents ask too many questions.

Due to the fact that I had such important things as Beauty Clay on my mind, it was understandable that my monthly marks in algebra should cause even more distress than usual in the bosom of my family. Each month the high-school honor roll, consisting of the names of the ten highest students in each class, was published in the Franklin News-Herald. And each month my name was prominently absent. Finally my father said that if I got on the honor roll he'd give me five dollars. Wobbly as I was in mathematics, it took me only a flash to realize this sum was approximately equal to $4.98, or the price of the Beauty Clay. From there on in, I was straining every muscle. When I say that I got 89 in algebra and climbed to the bottom rung of the honor roll, I am stating a miracle simply. What is more important, I got the five bucks.

My father said that if I liked, he'd put it in my savings account. Bobby said, with even more enthusiasm, that he knew where I could get a bargain in a secondhand pistol. I declined both offers, marveling at the things men could think of to do with money, and made my way, on foot, to Riesenman's drugstore.

When Mr. Riesenman said he had no Beauty Clay, I was grieved. When he said he'd never even heard of the stuff, I was appalled. It took three trips to convince him that he must order it immediately, money on the line.

Then I went home and waited. Finally came the wonderful afternoon when Mr.

"Now that you've heard some of my experiences, Miss Smith, let me hear some of yours."

Riesenman said, "Here you are, Hildegarde." His jovial air may have been due to the fact that he was rid of me at last.

It took a week more before I could achieve the needed privacy for my quick-change act. Mother was taking Jimmy and Sally downtown to get new shoes, Bobby was going skiing, and my father, as usual, would be at the office. I got home to the empty house at twenty minutes of four, and made a beeline for the Beauty Clay. According to the directions, I then washed off all make-up, which in my own case was a faint dash of rice powder on my nose, and wrapped myself in a sheet "to protect that pretty frock"—or more accurately, my blue serge middy blouse. Then I took a small wooden spatula the manufacturer had thoughtfully provided, and dug into the jar.

The Beauty Clay was a rather peculiar shade of grayish green, and I spread this all over my face and neck—"even to the hairline where telltale wrinkles hide." The directions also urged me not to talk or smile during the twenty minutes it would take the clay to dry. The last thing in the world I wanted to do was talk or smile. That could come later. For now, a reverent silence would suffice. In fact, as the thick green clay dried firmly in place, it had to suffice. Even though my face and neck felt as if they'd been cast in cement, the very sensation reassured me. Obviously, something was happening. I sat bolt upright in a chair and let it happen.

After fifteen minutes of this, the doorbell rang. I decided to ignore it. The doorbell rang again and again, jangling at my conscience. Nobody at our house ever ignored doorbells, and I was relieved when it stopped. In my eagerness to see who had been calling on us, I ran to my window, opened it and leaned out. The departing guest was only the man who brought us country butter each week, I was glad to note. Hearing the sound of the window opening above him, he looked up. When he saw me leaning out, his mouth dropped open and he let out a hoarse, awful sound. Then he turned and ran down the steep hill at incredible speed. I couldn't imagine what had struck him, to act so foolish. It wasn't until I'd remembered the clay and went to look in a mirror that I understood. Swathed in a sheet, and with every visible millimeter of skin a sickly gray-green, I scared even myself.

According to the clock, the Beauty Clay had been on the required twenty minutes, and was now ready to be washed off. It occurred to me that if twenty minutes was enough to make me beautiful, thirty minutes or even forty minutes would make me twice as beautiful.

By the time my face was so rigid that even my eyeballs felt yanked from their sockets, I knew I must be done, on both sides. As I started back to the bathroom, I heard Bobby's voice downstairs yelling "Mom!" With the haste born of horror I ran back and just managed to bolt myself inside the bathroom as Bobby leaped up the stairs and came down the hall toward his room. Then I turned on the faucet and set to work. The directions had particularly warned, "Use only gentle splashes to remove the mask—no rubbing or washcloth." It took several minutes of gentle splashing to make me realize this was getting me nowhere fast. Indeed, it was like splashing playfully at the Rock of Gibraltar. I decided that maybe it wouldn't hurt if I rubbed the beauty mask just a little with a nailbrush. This hurt only the nailbrush. I myself remained embedded in Beauty Clay.

By this time I was getting worried. Mother would be home very soon and I needed a face—even my old face. Suddenly it occurred to me that a silver knife would be a big help, although I wasn't sure just how. When I heard Bobby moving around in his room, I yelled at him to bring me a knife from the dining-room sideboard. Rather, that's what I intended to yell, but my facial muscles were still cast in stone, and the most I could do was grunt. In desperation, I ran down to the sideboard, tripping over my sheet as I went, and got the knife. Unfortunately, just as I was coming back through the dusky upstairs hall, Bobby walked out of his room and met me face to face.

The mental impact, on Bobby, was terrific. I had often imagined how my family would look at me after the Beauty Clay had taken effect. Now it had taken effect—or even permanent possession of me—and Bobby was certainly reacting, but not quite as I'd pictured it.

"Wh-what?" he finally managed to croak, pointing at my face.

His concern was so obvious and even comforting that I tried to explain what had happened. The sounds that came out alarmed him even more.

Not having the time or the necessary freedom of speech to explain any further, I dashed into the bathroom and began hitting the handle of the knife against my rocky visage. To my heavenly relief, it started to crack. After repeated blows, which made me a little groggy, the stuff had broken up enough to allow me to wriggle my jaw. Meanwhile, Bobby stood at the door watching, completely bemused.

Taking advantage of the cracks in my surface, I dug the blade of the knife in, and by scraping, gouging, digging and praying, I got part of my face clear.

As soon as I could talk, I turned on Bobby. "If you tell anybody about this, I'll kill you," I said fiercely.

Whether it was the intensity of my threat or a latent chivalry aroused by seeing a lady tortured before his very eyes, I still don't know, but Bobby said, "Cross my heart and hope to die." He then pointed out that spots of the gray-green stuff were still very much with me. As I grabbed up the nailbrush again, to tackle these remnants, he asked in a hushed voice, "But what is it?"

"Beauty Clay," I said. "I sent away for it."

Bobby looked as though he couldn't understand why anyone would deliberately send away for such punishment, when there was already enough trouble in the world. However, for the first time in a long, hideous half hour, I remembered why I'd gone through this ordeal, and I now looked into the mirror expecting to see results that would wipe out all memory of suffering. The reflection that met my eye was certainly changed all right, varying as it did between an angry scarlet where the skin had been rubbed off, and the greenish splotches still clinging.

Maybe if I got it all off, I thought. When it was all off, except those portions wedded to my hair, I gazed at myself wearily, all hope abandoned. My face was my own, but raw. Instead of the Body Beautiful I looked like the Body Boiled.

"You look awfully red," Bobby said.

I did indeed. To add to my troubles, we could now hear the family assembling downstairs, and mother's voice came up: "Hildegarde, will you come set the table right away, dear?"

I moved numbly.

"You'd better take off the sheet," Bobby said.

I took off the sheet.

Just as I reached the stairs, he whispered, "Why don't you say you were frostbitten and rubbed yourself with snow?"

I looked at him with limp gratitude.

When mother saw my scarlet, splotched face, she exclaimed, "Why, Hildegarde, are you feverish?" She made a move as if to feel my forehead, but I backed away. I was burning up, but not with fever.

"I'm all right," I said, applying myself to setting the table. With my face half in the china cupboard, I mumbled that I'd been frostbitten and had rubbed myself with snow.

"Oh, Cliff," mother called. "Little Hildegarde was frostbitten."

My father immediately came out to the kitchen. "How could she be frostbitten?" he asked reasonably. "It's thirty-four above zero."

"But her ears still look white," mother said.

They probably did, too, compared with the rest of my face. By some oversight, I had neglected to put Beauty Clay on my ears. "I'm all right," I insisted again. "I rubbed hard to get the circulation going."

This at least was true. Anyone could tell at a glance that my circulation was going full blast, from the neck up.

Bobby had followed me out to the kitchen to see how the frostbite story went over. As mother kept exclaiming over my condition, he now said stanchly, "Sure, she's all right. Let her alone."

My father and mother both stared at him, in this new role of Big Brother Galahad. In fact, my father reacted rather cynically. "Bobby, did you and your friends knock Hildegarde down and rub her face with snow?" he asked.

"Me?" Bobby squeaked. He gave me a dirty look, as if to say, "You'd better talk fast."

I denied hotly that Bobby had done any such thing. In fact, I proceeded to build him up as my sole rescuer, a great big St. Bernard of a brother who had come bounding through the snowdrifts to bring me life and hope. Bobby looked so gratified at what he'd been through in my story that I knew my secret was safe.

And in a way I had been frostbitten, to the quick. Lying in bed that night, still smarting, I tried to think up ways to get even. It wasn't clear to me exactly whom or what I had to get even with. All I knew was that I was sore and unbeautiful, and mulcted of five dollars. With the hot-and-cold fury of a woman stung, I suddenly conceived my plan for revenge. It was so simple and logical and yet brilliant that my mind relaxed at last. Someday I, too, would write advertisements.

When mother and Aunt Laura decided to take their children—four Fahrs and four Dolsons—to Chautauqua for part of a summer, they had rosy notions about the culture we'd inhale through our pores. Mother had often told us about her own summers at Chautauqua as a young girl, when her days were filled with art lessons, lectures and concerts, and the nights were filled with more lectures and concerts. According to her account, it sounded as though everybody at Chautauqua were bitten by culture, and there was no antitoxin. Furthermore, I was given to understand that since I was the oldest of the eight children, the brunt of the cultural advantages would fall on me. "Now that you're old enough to appreciate it, Hildegarde."

Too much bursts the bag. Between saying and doing, many a pair of shoes is worn out.

The four Fahrs lived in Meadville and were near our own ages. Next to me came Gretchen, who was fifteen, with Dutch bangs and a wholesome affinity for athletics, then Mary, around Bobby's age, a pretty child with the only real curls in our family connection. Charles was a bit older than Sally, and Johnny, the youngest Fahr, had been born a year before Jimmy. Everybody agreed that Jimmy and Johnny were too young for culture, but that left more for the rest of us. I was sixteen that summer, and the last thing I wanted was culture, unless it came clad in knickers, with a record of Melancholy Baby under one arm.

As everyone knows, Chautauqua Lake is very long, with Jamestown at one end, Mayville, haven for eloping couples, at the other, and many summer settlements along both sides. But when people speak of going to Chautauqua for the summer, they mean the assembly grounds, which is the hotbed of culture, with more lecturers per square inch than Coney Island has barkers. The idea was that we should have a house on the grounds, practically under the eaves of the auditorium. I forget now what went wrong with these plans, but the ten of us ended up in a cottage directly across the lake, at a place called Maple Springs. Mother and Aunt Laura spoke glibly of how we'd row over to the grounds every afternoon for lectures and concerts, but after we'd been in Maple Springs a few days, during which it rained like fury, they mentioned it less frequently. When you have eight children, ranging in age from five to sixteen, shut up in one tissue-weight cottage, it's sometimes hard to keep your thoughts on culture.

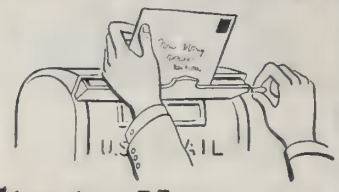
After the rain let up, our mothers sent us out to seek our simple pleasures, but even this was hardly conducive to the life contemplative for parents. The first day of our release, Bobby and Charles rigged up a sail for the rowboat: the lid of a cardboard dress box hoisted on a stick. They took Sally and Johnny out riding in this kiddies' makeshift for a sailboat, and were blown down the lake at such incredible speed, in a sudden storm, that the rest of us spent a harrowing afternoon thinking the Dolsons and Fahrs had lost two children apiece to a watery grave. At one point, I remember praying desperately, "Oh, God, if you'll send them back undrowned, I'll start going to church every Sunday." God fulfilled His part of this impromptu bargain, but my conscience still nudges me occasionally, when I think how I've let Him down.

The day after this dress-box-lid sailing episode, Sally, in bare feet, stepped on a rusty tin can and had to be rushed to a doctor, while Jimmy and Johnny ate most of an uncooked apple pie and vomited uproariously.

I myself got a sunburn to end all sunburns and, to sharpen the climax, choked on a glass of milk over a late supper, whereupon Bobby, thinking to be helpful, pounded me violently on my freshly burned back. This resulted in a pitched battle between my brother and myself, after I'd recovered my wind enough to yell at him. Everybody took sides vocally, and mother shouted above the din, "Laura, I'm glad we could arrange a quiet, cultural summer."

The beach at Maple Springs was pleasant enough for swimming, but it lacked the glamour of Midway, an amusement park ten minutes away from our cottage. Midway had a combination roller-skating rink and dance pavilion down near the water, with rows of soft-drink stands, and souvenir shops displaying paperweights, orange-handled whips and some of the most uninhibited sofa pillows it has ever been my fortune to admire. The purple satin with "Miss me, sweetheart?" embroidered in cerise was especially exotic.

The two largest buildings at Midway had a tightrope suspended from one roof to the other, and every day at two o'clock an intensely blond girl performer rode a bicycle across this high, swaying rope while her muscular partner stood below, in white satin trunks, playing I'm Nobody's Sweetheart Now on an accordion.



The attraction at Midway that, for Gretchen and me, really outdid the bicycle act was the handsome tanned lifeguard. From the first moment we saw him, the sands at Midway seemed incomparably whiter than the beach at Maple Springs. We complained that the pebbles on the Maple Springs beach suddenly hurt our feet, and that the water was too muddy. Not that it wasn't good enough for our younger brothers and sisters, we added hurriedly. It ended up that Gretchen and I were allowed to swim at Midway, provided we paid the fifty-cents-a-week locker fee out of our own allowances. In return for this cash outlay, the lifeguard actually said "Hello" to us almost every day, and once he complimented Gretchen on her crawl stroke. I myself was the type of swimmer who moves like a confused poodle, but I promptly tried to learn the crawl so that I, too, might garner a compliment.

Except for the lifeguard, the male population of Chautauqua Lake, or at least that portion Gretchen and I had access to, seemed strictly short-pants. To atone for this lack of romance, I spent happy ink-stained hours carrying on a correspondence with anything masculine who would squander a two-cent stamp on me. Of the men I was writing to that summer, by far the most colorful replies came from a Southern boy I'd met the year fore in Meadville. I called him Laurie, not cause it was his name, but because I was ll under the influence of Little Women. I'd rely had time to accept his Eagle Scout pin d call him Laurie before he'd gone back to orida, but we'd been tenderly intimate in tters. It was my first experience with the uthern brand of honey; under the spell of s letters, my female ego was expanding like ast dough in a warm oven. When he wrote Your eyes are like a sapphire lake at dusk," though, actually, my eyes were more like old Albino that had been left out in the n too long, I naturally lapped it up.

One day Bobby and Charles brought in the ail and handed me two letters from Laurie. Say, Hildegarde," Bobby said, "what does at guy find to write about so often? Does tell you about his scouting activities?" Bobby had been very much impressed with e Eagle Scout pin.)

I looked up from a page of Laurie's letter led with fascinating descriptions of my air, and fibbed blandly. "Yes, he tells me out scouting, and about hunting and fishg in Florida."

"Gee," my brother said. "I'll bet he shoots ligators down there. Can I read some of his tters?"

I told him he most certainly couldn't, and ent on reading.

"But I know more about hunting and fishg than you do," Bobby said.

I told him not to bother me, which was a ad mistake. I was insulting him in front of harles, who was his admiring shadow that mmer.

Bobby stomped off the porch saying, "You ouldn't even know a twenty-two from a rty-five. I'll bet you don't understand hat he's writing about alf the time."

When I came back from lidway later that day, nother said I'd hurt obby's feelings, because wouldn't let him read aurie's letters about hooting alligators. I ulped, and stared at her ith rising horror, as she ent on to say it would be ice if I just read Bobby a w paragraphs. "Only the parts he'd be nterested in," she said. "I'm sure all the hildren would be quite thrilled to hear hem." I tried to protest, but mother was rm. "Why don't you pick out a couple of tters and read them aloud after dinner? t will give Bobby and the others so much leasure."

As I went upstairs, I reflected that the leasure Bobby and the other children would lerive from hearing Laurie's letters was a ather different type of enjoyment than nother had in mind. I sat down on the bed nd tried to think of what I knew about algators. The one fact I was sure of was that lligators had jaws. It hardly seemed nough. I gritted my own jaw and set to vork, drawing on my Rover Boys backround, a Pearl White serial I'd seen once vhich contained a whole den of alligators, nd my own diseased imagination. Eventully I produced an opening sentence: "One oggy morning we poled our bark down the luggish river lined on both sides by snapping jawed, scaly beasts." This pleased me o much I continued for several hundred words, in the same restrained style. When I inished, I copied it in pencil very lightly between the lines of a six-page letter from Laurie. By that time my only regret was hat I couldn't have a by-line.

That evening, after dinner, my brothers, sister and cousins sat on the floor around my chair, with their fiendishly intelligent little faces upturned, ready to listen. I read very fast, on the theory that the faster I went, the ess time Bobby would have to digest any flaws. For extra measure, I'd thrown in a dramatic episode of Laurie struggling in quicksand, while the alligators closed in. At hat point Bobby interrupted to say, "Gosh, I didn't realize alligators lived in quicksand." He didn't say it critically, just thoughtfully, but it gave me quite a turn.

When I'd killed off a ten-foot scaly beast and slung it over Laurie's back for the triumphant trek homeward, I stopped reading. My younger listeners seemed well satisfied, but Bobby asked, "Didn't Laurie tell how to tan the alligator hide?"

I sat up late that night writing a frantic letter to my Southern beau, requesting that he send me full descriptions of hunting alligators and any other material suitable for reading aloud in family groups. "Also how to tan hides," I added in a P. S. He came through handsomely by return mail, and even offered to send Bobby a small live alligator. I rejected this offer in a hurry, without consulting my brother.

As a pleasant diversion from scaly beasts, our Cousin Priscilla Gill came from Meadville to visit us for two weeks. A cot was set up in Gretchen's and my room, and our nightly talks acquired a more worldly slant. Priscilla, who was seventeen, had brought along a book that belonged to her older sister, called Reflections of a Bachelor Girl, and she read Gretchen and me titbits from it nightly. There were profound hints on how to hold or recapture a husband, which is, of course, a thing a Wise Bachelor Girl writes best about. We discussed this gravely for several nights, and it's hard for me to say now at just what point Priscilla and I arrived at the curious conclusion that Aunt Laura must do something if she wanted to hold Uncle Carl. I should explain right now that my aunt was, and is, an extremely handsome woman. In addition, she had a sassy wit, an enchanting laugh, and there was about as much danger of her losing her man as there is of my being mistaken for Miss Atlantic City. Just the same, Priscilla and I were terribly concerned.

To my mind, the best and most faultless character is his who is as ready to pardon the rest of mankind, as though he daily transgressed himself; and at the same time as cautious to avoid a fault as if he never forgave one.

—PLINY THE YOUNGER.

At first Gretchen insisted earnestly that her father really loved her mother, even if they argued sometimes. "They both like to argue," she said.

Priscilla and I refused to be lulled by this. "Think back, Gretchen," our older cousin said. "Does he phone her as often as he used to?" (The Wise Bachelor Girl thought this was highly significant.)

Gretchen immediately pointed out that there was no phone in the cottage, and Priscilla was stumped for a minute. "He comes up every week end and he writes mother in between," Gretchen added.

"But do they act as if they were on their second honeymoon?" I persisted. "Do they hold hands?"

Gretchen began to look worried.

"Does he notice her clothes?" Priscilla continued. "Does he call her darling?"

From that point on, Gretchen listened submissively while we mapped out a campaign to recapture Uncle Carl.

The next day was Saturday, and Uncle Carl and my father were due early in the afternoon. Obviously, we had to work fast, but the delicate part was to acquaint Aunt Laura with our plans. It took us almost all that Saturday morning to get her alone.

"Aunt Laura," Priscilla began bravely, "as long as Uncle Carl is coming this afternoon, I thought maybe you'd like to borrow my mascara. You have such lovely eyes that you ought to—er—we thought ——"

"Why, thank you, dear," Aunt Laura said. "But I'd probably stick the brush in my eyes and get pinkeye or something."

"Please, mother," Gretchen said, with the intensity of a child who is staging a last-ditch fight to keep her home together. "Priscilla could put it on for you."

Aunt Laura looked at Gretchen thoughtfully. Then she turned to Priscilla. "Had you thought of anything else besides the mascara?"

It was so easy we could hardly believe it. Priscilla and I took turns outlining a few other trifles we had in mind for our aunt, including curls around her face (Priscilla had a curling iron), perfume (I had a small bottle), and sheer stockings (courtesy of my mother). When we went up to my aunt's room, she not only agreed to all our ideas, but even added a few of her own. "I could wear my flowered chiffon," she said.

Since I had overheard her telling mother that the flowered chiffon was her mistake of the year, and made her feel like a marriageable oldest daughter at the vicar's garden party, I was a little puzzled by this suggestion. However, when our aunt explained, "It's so much more feminine, with the curls," we all agreed. Even when we burned her ear with a hot curling iron, Aunt Laura was very gay, and said a woman must put up with a few inconveniences, to be alluring. She was an ideal patient.

By the time we'd finished with her, she was a bundle of femininity, from the curls to the high-heeled pumps. Looking at her, I had an uneasy feeling that she didn't look like our aunt any more, but the book had said "Be a different woman to your husband," and she was different, all right.

She pirouetted before the mirror, and asked us to send Kitty up to her when we went downstairs. "So I can explain to her about borrowing her stockings," she said. Mother and Aunt Laura stayed upstairs quite a while, and when they came down to lunch together they were suitably solemn.

Usually they went down together to the dock, when it was time for the launch bringing their husbands, but Priscilla took Aunt Laura aside and suggested tactfully that it would be more effective if she were just sitting on the porch, waiting, when Uncle Carl arrived. Our aunt agreed to this at once.

Mother went off with the six other children, but Priscilla, Gretchen and I stayed to watch the initial impact on Uncle Carl. We were in the living room, where we could peek out and hear nicely, without being in the way of a second honeymoon.

When our uncle came up the walk, ahead of the others, he looked hot and cross. "Where on earth were you?" he asked my aunt, bending to kiss her. Then he straightened up, staring. "What have you done to your hair?"

Aunt Laura was not only a new woman, but she had a new voice, purringly sweet. "Do you like it?" she said, rolling her eyes and smoothing the flowered chiffon.

"No," my uncle said. "It looks like a hula dancer's."

Priscilla, Gretchen and I stirred uneasily. All was not going according to plan.

"I did it all for my big handsome husband," our New Woman cooed.

"I'm in no mood for sarcasm," Uncle Carl told her.

"But, darling, I only wanted to please you"—said with even more of a coo.

At that, Uncle Carl let out an angry roar. "Laura, if you don't stop simpering like an imbecile —— What's got into you?"

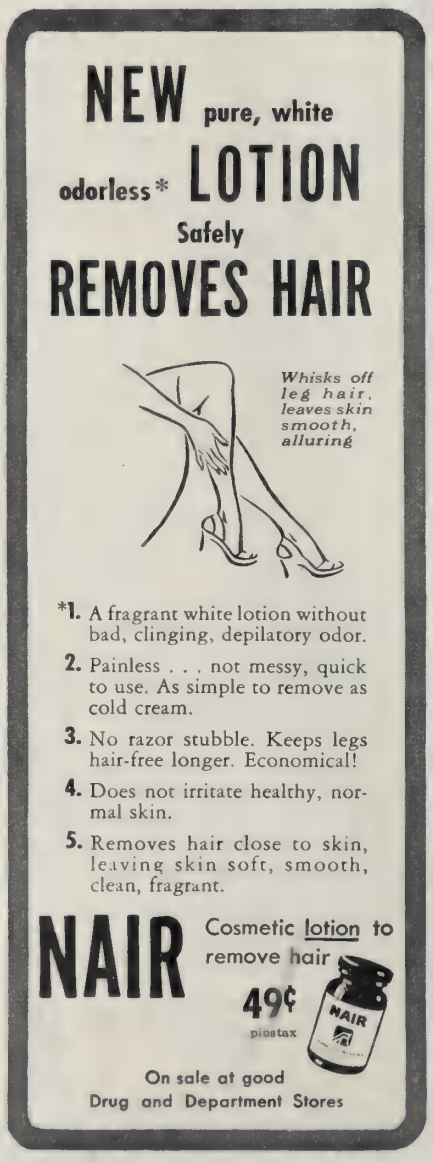
"Now, dear," our aunt said. "Let's take a nice long walk, just the two of us."

My uncle roared even louder. "It's not enough that I should spend five hours on trains and boats and God knows what else, getting here. Now I should go for a ten-mile hike. Are you crazy?"

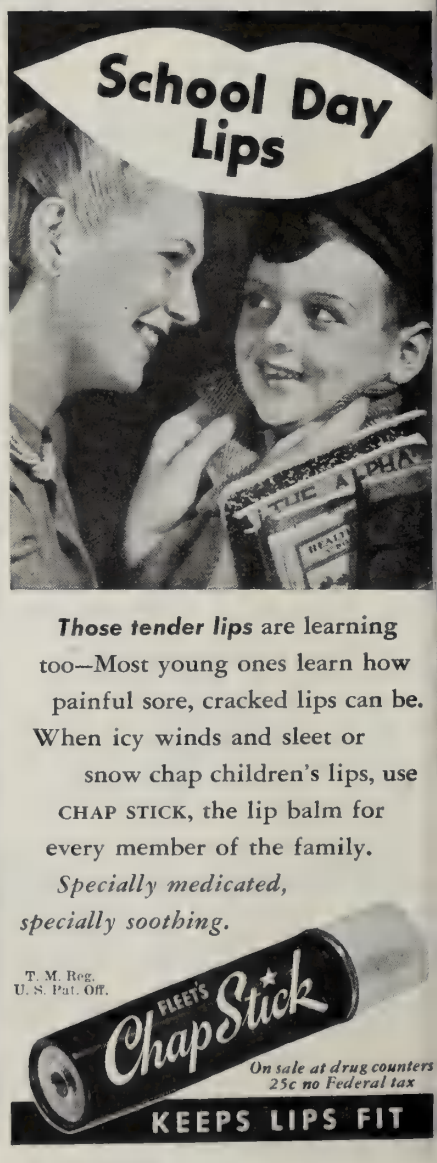
We couldn't stand any more. Grabbing Gretchen between us, we rushed her out the back door and hauled her off to Midway, before she had a chance to weep on her father's shoulder. I wanted to go down to the dock to see my own father, but under the circumstances, it seemed only tactful to wait. "I guess it's already too late for a second honeymoon," Gretchen said sadly. Priscilla tried to console her by saying it often took several weeks for this recapturing process, but all of us felt worried.

The first break in our triangular gloom came when we returned an hour later and learned that Aunt Laura and Uncle Carl had gone walking. "You see," Priscilla said.

When they came back, they walked into the cottage holding hands, and both of them were so gay that even Gretchen was reassured. All through dinner, Uncle Carl kept calling Aunt Laura "darling."



"Don't you think so, darling?" he'd ask.



"Yes I do, darling," she'd say.

It was awfully romantic.

Even the next day, when Aunt Laura appeared with no curls, no mascara and no flowered chiffon, Uncle Carl went on being loverlike. Priscilla, Gretchen and I nearly burst with pride in our handiwork. All in all, we got very little culture that summer, but at least we recaptured Uncle Carl.

Probably the only man I have ever left an indelible impression on is my high-school physics teacher, who went through tortures trying to reduce Newton's laws of gravity to something I could grasp, if only in both fists.

"Now look, Miss Dolson," he would say, breathing rather hard. "Here we have a jar half full of water, and I will now drop in a stone. What happens?"

As far as I could see, nothing happened, but I knew this couldn't be the right answer. I had learned to my sorrow that according to the laws of physics something always happens.

God promises a safe landing, but not a calm passage.

"But if the stone weighs one pound and the water rises in the receptacle ——" Here Mr. Lowrie's voice would break, and he'd look at me pleadingly.

It grieved me to see him suffer so, but there was nothing I could do about it, unless Clark Frame, the brightest student in our physics class, managed to slip me the written answer. To me, a stone in water was a stone in water, and hardly worth all this to-do. However, toward the end of the second term, I learned to say glibly "A body displaces its own weight in water." Flushed with this success, Mr. Lowrie was once so carried away that he asked, "And what is the principle behind that, Miss Dolson?" When I looked surprised, he said hurriedly, "Very good. You may sit down now. Er—Mr. Frame—did I see your hand?"

In addition to The Body That Displaced Its Own Weight, there was one other law which Mr. Lowrie succeeded in engraving upon my mind: "What goes up must come down." The chances are that this is the most valuable piece of knowledge I have ever achieved. At any rate, when I wrote it down on my physics examination paper in a firm, legible hand, Mr. Lowrie immediately decided to pass me. After all, I had been with him nine months, and a man can stand just so much.

Thanks to this, and to the law that what goes in as a freshman must come out in four years, I was being graduated with the class of '26 from the Franklin High School. My grasp on The Deerslayer, Julius Caesar, and the dangling participle being considerably firmer than my grasp of physics, I had even been chosen to deliver a speech at commencement.

The week of graduation was wonderful. My father and mother had given me two elegant new dresses—one for the prom and one for the senior banquet—and my relatives, prodded by engraved announcements, had come through nobly with gifts. Laurie, the alligator-hunting Eagle Scout from Florida, sent me a bedside lamp that burned incense and could smell up a room something lovely.

By graduation time I had pretty well forgotten Laurie, although not to such an extent that I neglected to send him the engraved announcement that brought forth the incense burner. What I was concentrating on now was a Sigma Chi who had gone to Pitt. He was a distinguished older man of twenty-three, and even Sally admitted grudgingly that he was handsome.

On the night I was to make my commencement speech, the Sigma Chi arrived to drive me down to the high school in his jouncy third-hand jalopy. When I stepped into the car, he handed me my present, a silver compact with the Sigma Chi crest. Even if he'd handed me a corncob I'd have found it desirable, feeling as I did about distinguished older men. But this—I was too overcome to talk, for at least five seconds.

As I climbed into my commencement robe and adjusted the mortarboard at a skittish angle, I was thinking dreamily that the Sigma Chi was now sitting in the audience, and would wait for me afterward. My entire family and at least ten of my relatives from Meadville were also in the auditorium to hear me deliver my oration.

It was a very warm evening in June, and all of us seniors, sitting in rows on the platform, found our heavy black robes rather excessive, as speaker after speaker droned on about the pitfalls we'd encounter. Finally my name was announced, and I stepped to the center of the stage. I'd rehearsed the speech so often that I wasn't nervous. At least, I didn't think I was nervous.

"Ladies, gentlemen and teachers," I said. "We of the senior class have shared many vicissitudes, and now we are going out into the great world, to stand or fall on our own merits." (This must have been news to all those parents, including my own, who expected to provide food, shelter and clothing for some time to come.) There were two more sentences to my introduction, and after delivering them I drew a deep breath before plunging into the body of my speech. In the next second, I knew with icy shock that I'd plunged into a vacuum. All memory of the speech was gone. With five hundred faces looking up at me in polite expectancy, I shifted my feet and waited.

Suddenly the very last sentence of the speech floated into my head, and I grabbed at it thankfully. "Let us all hitch our wagon to a star," I said ringingly, "and continue ever upward—higher and higher and higher." Then, having consumed approximately fifty-five seconds for my entire oration, I sat down.

The audience, which had come to value brevity almost as much as a good breeze, applauded me roundly. Afterward, all my relatives congratulated me on my nice little speech.

With my diploma in one hand and my Sigma Chi compact in the other, I was now presumably ready for college. Several years before, I had picked the college of my choice—Allegheny, in Meadville, twenty-five miles from home.

In early September of 1926, father piled all my luggage into the car, and we drove to Meadville, where I was deposited in Hulings Hall, the girls' dormitory. Allegheny College is on a hill at one side of the town, with some beautiful old buildings, a small, pretty campus, and five or six men's fraternity houses. As we drove through the campus to Hulings it wasn't the Gothic architecture of the main building I was ogling, but the bricks that hid Delts, Phi Gams, etcetera from view.

IN the dean's office at Hulings, I was told I'd share a room on the fourth floor with a freshman from Erie. Mother came up with me to look over the big, light room and give me her final blessing. It was one of the many times when I've been glad my mother isn't addicted to tears or gush. "Plug in your electric curling iron and fix your hair before dinner, dear," she said stoutly. At that moment I felt as if the curling iron were lodged in my throat, but I swallowed and nodded. For the first time, five hundred students sounded like an awful lot of strangers to cope with.

After mother left I began to unpack, when the door opened and my new roommate walked in. She was a brunette just my height, and so pretty that I felt gripped around the knees by an inferiority complex as I looked her over warily. She said her name was Esther LeJeal and that she didn't care which cot I took. For the next hour, as we filled the bureau drawers and closets, we admired each other's clothes and traded life histories, from first molar to first love. Then Esther confided that she'd been simply depressed in the dean's office when they'd told her the name of her new roommate. "I thought you'd be a fat-faced girl with heavy oxfords and long Dutch braids or something," she said. We both shuddered pleasurably to think what she'd escaped. To add to my gratification, she said that the minute she saw me, she thought I looked exactly like a John Held girl. Even now I am sure she meant it as a compliment, and I certainly took it for one. If she'd said I looked like Clara Bow, I couldn't have been more charmed.

ESTHER seemed to me terribly sophisticated. For one thing, she talked about dashing around in roadsters, and seemed honestly appalled when I said I'd never even ridden in a rumble seat. She promised that the first week end I went home with her to Erie, she'd get me into a rumble. When she mentioned that she was simply dying for a cigarette, and wasn't I furious about not being allowed to smoke in Allegheny, I did my best to sound indignant, although so far I had only smoked one cigarette in my life.

That night we met another freshman named Sarah Wakefield whom we liked very much. Esther, Sarah and I were pledged by the same sorority and had the same schedule of classes, so we were together constantly. We had hoped to eat at the same table in the big Hulings Hall dining room, but a frighteningly efficient new dietitian soon spiked that. After lining up all the girls in the dormitory—well over a hundred—she proceeded to pick out twenty whom she divided into two groups and sat at two special feeding tables—one Terribly Overweight and the other Terribly Underweight. To my vast indignation, I was in the latter group. It's true that my figure seemed to consist mostly of collarbones, but this was the first time I had been publicly labeled as a freak, and I resented it fiercely. Privately, each of us at the table thought the other nine belonged there, and this hardly made for friendly banter. The dietitian's idea of fattening us up was to say playfully—as playfully as a warden at Sing Sing—"Now, nobody can leave the table until each glass of chocolate milk is drained to the last drop." Whichever of us stalled along on the chocolate milk or the second helping of raw starch would be glared at nastily by the other nine, who asked only to get away from there as fast as possible.

To add to our sufferings, we had to report for two forced feedings a day—one at four and more goodies at ten P.M. The night we were given leftover creamed spinach soup as our bedtime snack, I sneaked over and poured mine down the sink. Unfortunately, the dietitian saw me do it, and I was forced to lap up another bowl of the boresome stuff. Otherwise, she said, I wouldn't get a two-day leave to go to Erie that week end. With my mind on Esther's promise to get me into a rumble seat, I said it was spinach, but I ate it.

The week end atoned for this magnificently, with a football game, dancing at Steve's Roadhouse, and a view of life from a rumble seat. At first I was embarrassed because I couldn't leap up over the fender with the same gazellelike grace as the Erie girls, nor was this worry assuaged when Esther announced in her bell-like voice, "Imagine! Hildegarde's never been in a rumble before." However, on this and dozens of subsequent week ends spent with the hospitable LeJeals, I came to the reasonable conclusion that Erie was the Promised Land for visiting females. Certainly that lake region produced the best dancers it had ever been my luck to tread upon. Within a few months I had shifted my affections from Sigma Chi to an Erie lad who not only knew all the latest steps, but even made steps up himself. For extra gravy, he read good books, and we discussed literature and the drama whenever the band went out for intermission. It was he who introduced me to Mencken and Nathan (embalmed between book covers), and I became so enamored of Nathan especially that I vowed that when I went to New York "to become a writer," I would sit on the doorstep of Nathan's hotel till I saw him in person. Secretly I already thought of myself as a writer, although why I should use the word "secretly" I don't know, since I proclaimed my calling loudly to all comers.

Esther, Sarah Wakefield and I all took freshman English from a young professor who had recently been an Allegheny student himself, and had just received his Master's at Harvard. He had a silly little mustache and a phony Harvard accent sheathed in carbolic acid. I think now that he was simply scared stiff for his own dignity, and that he used sarcasm as a tommy gun, to keep us from coming too close. We disliked him cordially.

At least once a week, he read five or six poems to us without giving the name or author, and would ask the class to criticize. Being freshmen, we criticized plenty. Sometimes he would accept these comments affably, but every now and then he'd react on all fours, snarling softly, and would pass out bad grades like candy. We couldn't figure it out. Luckily, he became very smitten with Esther, a fact we didn't catch onto until he danced with her at a fraternity party one night and confessed fondly that some of the poetry he'd read us in class was his own. After this valuable tip, which we generously circulated through the entire freshman English class, we learned to watch his face and spot the slightly glassy-eyed look he always assumed before reading his own creations. As soon as he finished and asked for comments, we gave him the works, ranging from "lyrically aware" to "tender" and back again. He must have marveled at our sudden critical appreciation, but it improved our grades. It also improved our professor, who began to act almost human.

Meanwhile, I had taken to writing poems of my own in chemistry class, and my creative efforts were running into trouble. Our professor, a Doctor Lee, was famous for his irascible command: "Every student must watch my nose every minute." Now that I had to watch Doctor Lee's nose, there was no point in my going so far as to listen to him, because I never had the remotest notion what he was talking about anyway. Instead, while the molecules and the formulae flitted over my head, I sat grappling with the muse. Whenever other students jotted something down in their notebooks, I wrote down the lines I'd just finished composing. Then I'd absent-mindedly mutter them over to myself, with my lips moving like a contented half-wit's.

SITTING as I did in the back row of an enormous class, it was several months before Doctor Lee noticed me. But once he did, the effect was explosive. Even in my faraway seat, I seemed to be directly in his line of ire.

"You, young lady," he'd bellow, pointing an outraged arm in my direction. "If you can't stop talking, you can leave the class at once. And the students you were talking to can all leave with you."

The first time this happened, I explained nervously I wasn't talking to anyone.

"Don't tell me that, young lady," he roared. "I can see your lips moving."

I said I was talking to myself.

"And what do you say to yourself in these little chats?" he asked. I told him that I was sort of reciting. At this, he snorted, "Wait and recite when you're called on."

In a class that size, I knew that only students who put up their hands were apt to be called on, and I wasn't so daft as to think of putting up my hand. However, after this first set-to, I tried very hard to keep my mind on molecules and all the h's with those baffling little numbers attached. It was no use. Within a few days I was back at my muttering.

Then Doctor Lee would roar, like a man tried beyond endurance, "You there—you talking to yourself—leave the room."

I forget how many times I trotted out obediently at this command. Doctor Lee often dismissed students from his class, but since he seldom remembered to ask our names, it didn't much matter.

Then came the day when, instead of dismissing me, he said grimly, "Young lady, stand up and read us what you just wrote down in your notebook."

What I had just written was a brand-new poem, and I was wrapped in the eager, tremulous glow of any young writer who longs for an audience. Even so, something told me that Doctor Lee wasn't the right audience.

"Do I have to read it?" I asked modestly.

"You do," he said.

I WAS frightened, but I was also proud. Looking back, I think I must even have been touched in the head, as I cleared my throat and prepared to read the title: My Thoughts on Love After Reading Strange Interlude.

Just as I opened my mouth, Doctor Lee turned to the blackboard and picked up a piece of chalk, as if to write down whatever equations my addled brain had conceived. At the same moment the boy in the seat next to mine yanked frenziedly at my arm and handed me his open notebook, pointing to a line halfway down the page. By the time Doctor Lee turned around, I was staring at my neighbor's neat list of equations.

"Read," my tormentor said.

I read the list, right down to the bottom of the page. When I'd finished and looked at Doctor Lee, he seemed astounded and pleased. "That's very good, young lady," he said. "I may even say that's one hundred per cent perfect."

I gave him a shy thank you and sat down.

From that time on, he never roared at me. Evidently he'd decided that muttering to myself was my own peculiar way of being a careful scholar.

The advanced writing courses at Allegheny were taught by Doctor Swartley, who had the face of a nonconformist cherub. Once I came into his class looking so determinedly tragic that he asked, "What's hit you, Hildegarde?" I opened whatever textbook we were using and pointed dramatically to the chapter headed NEVER WRITE UNLESS YOU HAVE SOMETHING TO SAY. Even then I sensed a rule like that would knock my literary hopes to a fare-thee-well. Doctor Swartley must have had equal misgivings about my ever having Something to Say, because he immediately told me I could stop reading the textbook. I sold it that night to a freshman, for a dollar, a chiffon handkerchief and a wild feeling of relief.

At the start of my senior year I signed up for a seminar course of Doctor Swartley's that didn't even require a textbook. After existing for two weeks in this ideal state, I came to the sudden and unreasonable conclusion that I must leave school at once. Never before or since have I had such a strong, driving impulse, and for no apparent reason. My tuition was paid well in advance, my Erie beau danced as well as ever, and in my world young ladies didn't become seniors and then say, "Who wants a diploma anyway?" The very idea appalled me, but I knew with a curious grim certainty that I'd come to a dead end in my primrose path, and that there was nowhere to go but out. I didn't know where "out" was, but I had to go there anyway.

When I went home to Franklin and told my parents I was leaving school, they behaved exactly as I must have known they'd behave, with tact and loyalty. I was their oldest child and I was doing something they didn't like or understand, but if it was necessary for my peace of mind, then they'd back me up all the way.

"I think you ought to go and live in New York," mother told me, as casually as if we were discussing a family picnic. "You've had enough of small towns for a while."

The next morning I went back to school to talk to the president of the college. I had read one time in an Allegheny catalogue that if a student paid his tuition and board and then became ill and had to leave school, his money would be refunded. I thought this over carefully, as I waited outside the president's office. When I was finally ushered in, I didn't waste time in palaver. I said breathlessly:

"I have to leave school because I'm mentally ill, so may I please have my money back?"

The president backed toward a chair and sat down hard. "Er—uh—what makes you think you're mentally ill?"

Whatever I told him must only have confused him more. He was a brand-new president, and for all he knew his caller was ripe for a strait jacket, but he wanted to make sure.

I can't remember how we finally settled my mental status, but we shook hands cordially, and I left with the happy assurance that my money would be refunded. Two weeks before, it had been my father's money, and now it was mine. I'm not sure just what logic I used to arrive at this alchemy, but I needed cash to go to New York, and that was logic enough.

Fourteen hours after I'd left Franklin, I was standing in the prow of the ferry crossing over from Jersey City, where the train ride had ended, to New York. I stood in the sun staring at the blindingly beautiful sky line, saying under my breath, "Here I am—here I am," as if the skyscrapers had been expecting me for years, and would answer, "At last you've come."

When the ferry landed at Twenty-Third Street and the other passengers rushed past me, I held on to my suitcase and stood there in a happy daze. Mother had told me to take a cab to the McAlpin Hotel, where my cousin, Betty Dunn, would meet me. Betty, who was just eighteen, had come from Meadville to New York to study dancing, and was staying with our Aunt Lou and Uncle George Porter in Brooklyn. Our mothers had arranged that I, too, should stay there, until Aunt Lou found Betty and me a nice room in a Y.W.C.A. or something. The problem now was to get to Betty. Most of the ferry passengers had already disappeared. When I saw a taxi with one man sitting in the back, I rushed over to it. In Franklin there were only three taxis, and the few passengers dismounting from a train always piled in together. In view of that custom, it seemed odd there should be only one man in this cab. I yanked open the door and shoved my suitcase into the back seat.

THE man looked astonished, and the driver said, "Listen, girlie, this is already taken."

"But there's plenty of room," I said, bewildered.

The driver shrugged and turned to look back at his passenger, a middle-aged man wearing a derby and holding a brief case in solid dignity.

"It's—er—it's all right, driver," he said. "If the young lady is going uptown."

"Is the McAlpin uptown?" I asked.

They assured me it was, and we rode off in silence. After several blocks the man asked if this was my first visit to New York. I nodded, hurt that he had guessed. From then on I tried not to stare out the window to gape at the sights, but when we stopped for a red light I forgot and pointed eagerly to a skyscraper in the distance. "Oh, is that the Flatiron?" The man said it was the Metropolitan Life Insurance Building. Warming to his new job as guide, he pointed out several other spires, and assured me that the rest of New York was much more handsome.

As we drove up before the McAlpin and I dug into my purse, he said, "Oh, no, this ride is on me." A bellhop grabbed my bag, and suddenly I was standing on the sidewalk waving to the man as the cab drove off. Why, New Yorkers are sweet, I thought.

Just inside the lobby I saw my Cousin Betty's cute round face. I was impressed by her worldliness in tipping the bellhop, and her casual way of saying, "Let's go across the street to Schrafft's." In Meadville, she had seemed to me simply a kid cousin with exceptionally pretty legs, but now that she had been in New York several months, I looked up to her as a cosmopolitan who had instant access to places like Schrafft's. While we ate a second breakfast, we talked about our plans for living together. Betty said Aunt Lou wanted us to stay in Brooklyn with her for at least two weeks, while she investigated rooms suitable for her nieces.

"BUT don't we want to live on Broadway?" I asked. I had heard it was important to have a good address for job hunting, and I had long ago decided that in New York all the important people must live on Broadway.

Betty seemed charmed with the idea. She explained that her ballet and tap schools and her vocal teacher were all located in the Fifties, and it would be a great convenience to live on Broadway, near them.

"Let's go out right now and find our room," I said. Betty started to say, "But Aunt Lou——" and then she mentioned thoughtfully that we might at least buy a paper and look at Rooms for Rent. Both of us kept up the deception that this would save Aunt Lou a terrific lot of trouble. "We'll surprise her," I said.

If I am walking with two men, each of them will serve as my teacher. I will pick out the good points of one and imitate them, and the bad points of another and correct them in myself.

—CONFUCIUS: Wisdom of the Chinese, edited by Brian Brown. (Coward-McCann, Inc.)

A half hour later we were entering a dingy brick building at the corner of Broadway and Fifty-sixth Street. It had been our first choice in Rooms for Rent, listed tersely as "Clean double room, $12 week, ring Littles' bell."

We rode up to the fourth floor in a tiny elevator that heaved and wheezed from old age. A dark-haired woman in a red-and-white house dress who said she was Mrs. Little showed us the room. It contained a double bed, a bureau, a brown plush upholstered chair, two cane-bottomed chairs, an upright piano and a washstand. While Betty exclaimed over the piano, I ran to the window, opened it and leaned out. Below was the roaring traffic tide of Broadway; across the street and level with our window was a huge electric sign for automobiles. Hanging out by my heels, I could even see the Paramount Building and the clock. Betty came and leaned beside me, and we beamed first on Broadway and then on each other. We had found our nest.

After we'd paid the first week's rent and Mrs. Little had shown us where the community bathroom was, a mere few hundred yards' trek down a narrow dark hall, we alternately hung out the window and unpacked my suitcase.

Then we took the subway for Brooklyn, to surprise my aunt and uncle with news of our find.

They were surprised all right. Aunt Lou kept saying weakly, "But it must be an office building." When Uncle George came home, he said, "On Broadway! Are you girls out of your minds?" Fortunately for us, he was enough concerned with that day's crash in the stock market, which we now heard about for the first time, to register only occasional shock.

At dinner I happened to mention something about "the man who took me to the McAlpin."

"She means the cab driver," Betty said hurriedly.

I said I did not mean the cab driver, I meant the nice man who paid my fare.

Once more Uncle George's face took on a purplish tinge. "You mean you let a strange man lure you into a cab?"

"But I asked him to," I said.

Aunt Lou murmured, "Oh, dear. Oh, dear."

Uncle George dropped the carving knife and roared, "You what?"

"But he had the whole back seat to himself," I said. "So I just got in."

"I suppose you never heard of girls disappearing into white slavery," my uncle said ominously. Dinner was suspended while he gave me an impromptu lecture on the dangers awaiting girls who took up with strange men.

"But he was old," I said. "He was at least forty."

Once again my uncle dropped the carving knife. "Oh, Lord," he muttered, more in supplication than irreverence.

Aunt Lou said she was sure that now Hildegarde understood New York wasn't like Franklin she'd be very careful. Nevertheless, when we were ready to leave that night, it was Aunt Lou who said maybe our uncle should escort us home and look over our new living quarters. Betty and I looked at each other and then both protested ringingly that Uncle George was tired, and mustn't take that long trip. Finally he agreed to let us go off alone, after we'd assured Aunt Lou that Mrs. Little lived in the rooms next to ours. "Like a motherly chaperon," I said. I was learning rather fast.

By night, our new home seemed even more dazzling. The huge sign blinked on and off, casting its brilliance into our room, so that even as we lay in bed, we were as radiantly lit as if we'd set up a cot at Times Square. Eventually we went to sleep, with the screeching honks of Broadway for background lullabies.

For the first few days it seemed incredible to me that people on Broadway walked by putting one foot in front of the other, like ordinary mortals. Perhaps I'd expected them to propel themselves forward by skipping steps, or even to jump over one another in a gay, endless game of leapfrog. Whenever Betty took me over to Fifth or Park avenue, I'd favor these streets with a few polite comments and then hurry back to my richly tawdry love, my Broadway.

So far, the reverberations from Wall Street hadn't reached our Broadway nest, and the New York I'd seen, including the BMT subway, two Schrafft's and three theaters, seemed booming. For years I'd played a game of "If I were going to New York what shows would I see?" Now I could practically reach out my window and touch the theater marquees. At first, in my young snobbishness, I wondered if it was really proper to buy dollar seats and sit up in the top-row balcony. But my hunger to see every Grade A, B and even Z play won out, and except when solvent beaus paid for seats, Betty and I saw the stage from a vast distance, with our eyes and ears sharpened by affection, like a lover's sixth sense.

Another of my favorite pastimes was accompanying Betty to her dancing classes, especially the Jack Donahue-Johnny Boyle tap school on Fifty-fourth Street. Day after day I sat on a small bench in the tap studio watching the ten or twelve dancers facing me, Betty among them. The pounding of their cleats on the hardwood floor may have been deafening, but I never knew it. I was proud of the fact that Betty was one of the best dancers in her class.

Betty took singing lessons from a Mrs. Bellamann, whose studio was at the corner of Fifty-seventh and Seventh Avenue, a big beautiful duplex in the same building Dreiser lived in. Every time I walked into the elevator there with Betty, I'd think, Maybe I'll see him today. Once Betty pointed to a morose-looking wolfhound the elevator boy had on a leash, and said that was Dreiser's dog. I stared at it reverently.

"Dreiser's dog," I echoed with awe. "Maybe it sat in the same room while he was writing An American Tragedy."

Betty seemed unmoved by this thought. "The dog is really much better-looking than Dreiser," she said dispassionately.

Quite apart from the Dreiser aura, Mrs. Bellamann's studio seemed to me teeming with glamour. She herself was a handsome gay woman with the honey-tongued charm of a Southern belle, plus the stamina of a workhorse. While she and Betty were busy at the piano with a singing lesson, I was free to roam around the studio looking at autographed photographs.

Betty had told me Mrs. Bellamann's husband was "sort of a writer," and that he worked in their apartment across the hall from the studio. I knew Mr. Bellamann only as a thin, professorlike face with tortoiseshell glasses, a face that poked into the studio occasionally and withdrew in alarm when it saw us there.

When Mrs. Bellamann suggested generously that as a young writer I must meet her Henry and show him some of my work, I came to the studio with one of the stories I'd written for Doctor Swartley at school, one in which the Devil and God discussed a frigid wife and a purehearted mistress. After Mr. Bellamann had read it, I was invited across the hall to hear his comment. Now I saw the professorish face on a thin, tall figure, topped by gray-black hair.

"This story shows a very sophisticated viewpoint," he said. "Er—uh—it's difficult to understand how you've learned so much about life."

Flattered, I tried to arrange my foolish-virgin features into the face of a woman who has drunk to the dregs. When he said I should try the story on Cosmopolitan Magazine, immediately I composed in my mind the wire I would send my family, telling them that this, my first piece to be sent to a magazine, had sold. I went off feeling very benign toward the mild, thin man in the tortoiseshell spectacles, whom fame had passed by. Years later, when I read a powerful new novel, a best seller called Kings Row, by an author named Henry Bellamann, you could have knocked me over with a typewriter.

The rejection from Cosmopolitan was the first in a long, distinguished line of these formula slips saying The Editors Regret. For the first few months, I pinned each one up on the wall, until Betty said she thought it was a morbid idea. "They depress even me," she said plaintively.

My conception of my talents was undergoing quite a mauling. Through the graces of Uncle George, I had had an interview with the head of an advertising agency just after arriving in New York, and I came away feeling like Alice cringing under a toadstool. The man had made it very clear that the worst crime a beginner can perpetrate against big business is to have no experience and no shorthand or typing.

Several blocks down on Broadway, I had seen a second-story poster saying, "Want to be a typist? Learn in four weeks. Very low rates."

"I think it would be useful for a writer to know how to type with more than one finger," Betty said.

For the next month I spent my mornings at the school, at a total cost which barely dented my capital. Our instructor said we were on our honor not to look at the typewriter keys. My own honor was full of loopholes; when I wanted to hit a numeral or apostrophe, I looked for it. As a result, my typing even now is not so much touch system as finder's keepers.

At the end of four weeks, several of us were called into the office of the head of the school, a small bald man who said smilingly that he had recommended us for clerical jobs, and we were to go to such-and-such an address. Rather dazed, I went out with the four other girls, all of us holding slips of paper with the name Remington Rand and the address in downtown New York. An hour later we were hired, at eighteen dollars a week. I still hadn't the foggiest notion what the job entailed, but having come along for the ride, and having filled out an application with the other girls, I was hired before I knew what hit me.

The next morning I was given half a desk in a room with at least fifty other girls. The girl whose desk I shared showed me how to check figures on piles of reports.

"But what are we doing it for?" I asked.

She looked at me as if this were an obscene question. "This is the Complaint Department," she said finally. "We have to check the reports." I wanted to know where the reports came from and where they went next, but my co-worker considered this none of our business. "I've been here three years." she said stiffly, "and all you have to do is check the reports they give you."

For three days I sat there checking the figures, and boredom seeped out of me in languid trickles. On the afternoon of the third day, a revolutionary thought hit me: I could resign.

"Where do you go to resign?" I asked my desk mate.

Undoubtedly she considered this another of my fatuous rhetorical questions, but she pointed to a door. "There." I went.

I had planned simply to say "I resign," and then go away, but it wasn't that easy. Now it was Remington Rand's turn to ask questions. The man in the private office insisted nicely that I sit down and talk things over. While I sat there mute, he kept asking solicitously if somebody had been mean to me. I denied this, and tried to think up a good excuse. It seemed rude to tell the nice man that I wanted to leave because I was bored. Finally, I muttered I'd just discovered I was going blind. His horrified, sympathetic reaction was more than I'd bargained for. I got out of there fast, but not too fast to collect my three days' pay.

That night as Betty and I lay basking in the radiance of the automobile sign, we had a long talk on happiness. "People should never have to work just because they need money," I said. For perhaps the first time in my life, I was weighted with the bitter thought that other human beings might be spending six days a week on jobs they disliked as deeply as I'd disliked my stint in Complaints. The idea frightened me.

When I tried to explain this to Betty, she said comfortingly, "But it can never happen to us, because we know what we want to do. That's why we're so lucky."

Stoutly we reiterated our belief in each other's talents. After we'd gone through this heartening ritual, I felt fine again, and hungry. Betty found two apples she'd cached in her bureau drawer, and when she got back into bed she brought along a magazine opened to a piece by Robert Benchley, so that we might take turns reading aloud. Both of us regarded Mr. Benchley the way savages regard a witch doctor—with simple faith, as a cure-all. Within five minutes we were laughing so noisily that a tenant in the next room pounded on the wall. Even that pleased us, and we used the heels of our mules to pound back. Once more our egos perched over Broadway ready to soar, and never doubting we could fly like birds, instead of falling on our foolish heads.

A few days later I was working on a story when Betty came in and said that Arthur, the pianist who played for classes at the tap school, had been going over some new tunes at rest period that day. "They're his own tunes," she said. "And he needs somebody to do the lyrics. So I told him you could write them. You could, couldn't you?"

"Oh, sure," I said. When you're twenty-one, and you've never written a song lyric, and your morning mail consits solely of "The Editors Regret," it's a simple matter to say, "Oh, sure."

Neither of us guessed then that Arthur was to lead us up some lush blind alleys.

Arthur was a restless little man, almost bald at twenty-six, who worked a full day at the tap school, sold silverware "only to friends" on the side, and wrote a weekly column for his home-town paper in Germany, from which he'd emigrated as a young boy. When he said he knew song publishers and band leaders well, and that we'd quickly clean up a fortune, I believed him. It has always been irresistibly easy for me to believe such statements. Unfortunately, it developed that Arthur was always too busy. "I meant to see Rudy Vallee about our songs today," he would say, "but something came up." Something always came up. The odd thing was that whenever Arthur wrote a new tune, he could hardly wait to have me finish the lyrics for it. His bustling eagerness always made me feel we were right on the verge of something big.

Meanwhile, he had added still another venture to his multiple activities. He had decided to leave the Donahue tap school to open one of his own, and Betty agreed to come to him for private lessons. Arthur's new studio, with a cot in one corner where he slept, was in a tough section of the upper West Side. Due to the fact that he was busy selling silverware and other trifles in the daytime, he often gave lessons only in the evenings. "Don't ever walk through these streets alone at night," he told Betty. "Always get Hildegarde to chaperon you." Since I weighed ninety-five pounds, and had never mastered the principles of jiujitsu, I'm still not sure just how much protection I was.

Several weeks after he opened the school, he asked Betty how she'd like to work in a chorus line-up for one week, for thirty dollars. "And Hildegarde can write the lyrics for the chorus' opening song," he said. "I'll pay five dollars for them." Both Betty and I were beaming. For once Arthur sounded business-like. He said a friend of his ran a theater on Forty-second Street, and was allowing him to supply the chorus from among his tap pupils, in shifts. "It's a burlesque house," Arthur added casually.

To Betty and me, coming as we did from a line of Presbyterians, "burlesque" was simply an interesting new word. On our way home from Arthur's that night, Betty said she thought burlesque was a kind of vaudeville.

"Won't our families be pleased?" I said happily. Then, remembering with a pang that Arthur's fine plans didn't always materialize, I said maybe we'd better wait and write our parents after the opening night.

Betty agreed. "We don't want to raise their hopes for nothing," she said.

Everything proceeded smoothly. Betty rehearsed the routines all that next week in Arthur's studio, while I worked at home polishing up the lyrics. Arthur looked at one set and said, "Make 'em zippier." I obligingly turned out a new set which seemed to me very zippy indeed, something about "Let's kick up the welcome mat and have a lot of fun."

THE new girls were to enter the show on a Monday night, and that noon they rehearsed for the first time at the theater. "Did you see the rest of the cast?" I asked, when Betty came home.

She said the only principals at rehearsal were two men comedians and a minstrel singer. "They're pretty dumb. The comedians have the dullest jokes I've ever heard." She said several people had mentioned a girl named Peggy, who was evidently the star. "She'll be there tonight, of course," Betty said. "She must sing and dance."

Arthur had given me two tickets for the first performance, and I had invited an ex-Allegheny beau to accompany me. "It's something Betty is dancing in," I told him mysteriously. "And I wrote the lyrics." He seemed properly impressed.

At eight-fifteen that night we were entering a theater on West Forty-second Street, just off Broadway.

"Are you sure this is it?" my escort asked, in a rather strangled voice.

"It's the right name," I said. "The Gaiety."

When he still showed a curious reluctance to move, I impatiently took his arm and dragged him inside. As we were ushered to our seats, sixth row center, I was surprised to see a raised runway extending from the stage right down the whole length of the middle aisle, like a narrow bridge. The sight of it made my escort even more uneasy.

"Hildegarde," he said, with considerable agitation, "this can't be the right place. This is a burlesque house."

"Oh, then that's all right. Arthur said it was burlesque."

My friend's voice became hoarser. "You mean you knew all the time?"

"Why, of course, silly." I found it gratifying that he should be so overcome at the heights Betty and I had achieved. "It's sort of like vaudeville."

Suddenly the curtain rose and the chorus danced on stage, wearing short, ruffled blue gingham dresses. Betty was in the front row. "Oh, doesn't she look darling?" I cooed. Three seconds later the girls were singing my lyrics, the sweetest noise that ever smote my ears.

Responding to a gay nudge and my loudly whispered "I wrote the words," my companion muttered, "Oh, good, good." Even in my happy absorption, it struck me he was behaving very strangely.

After the chorus came the minstrel singer with several whiny songs, then the comedians Betty had mentioned. Their jokes seemed to be concerned exclusively with a dog's fondness for trees. Burlesque was awfully dull, I thought, not nearly so lively as the acts at the Palace. I hoped the star named Peggy would be better.

When the comedians disappeared, a new set of girls, plumply encased in spangled tights, pranced on stage and then down the runway, nodding and waving to the audience. So that's what it was for, I thought. This seemed to be a very friendly sort of place, with all the gay waving between customers and performers.

After the girls had retired into the wings there was a roll of drums, and a blinding spotlight center stage. Into the spotlight came one of the prettiest girls I've ever seen, very blond, very young, dressed in a long-sleeved sequined dinner dress and a feathered cap.

"That must be Peggy," I whispered proudly. At last things were looking up.

INSTEAD of launching into a song, as I'd expected, the girl began an odd, weaving motion with her hips, while the audience cheered. Suddenly, still weaving, she reached to the side of her dress, yanked at something, and the dress slid to the floor, revealing Peggy in a black satin slip, plus the feathered cap.

"Mercy!" I whispered. "What on earth is she doing?"

"She's taking off her clothes," my escort muttered.

It seemed an awfully odd thing to do.

As Peggy removed even more garments, and wriggled even more frenziedly, I sat round-eyed with astonishment. I wasn't shocked, just surprised. As Peggy came down to a fig leaf, I decided it might be better to omit a few details in writing to my parents about our Broadway debut. As Betty said later that night, "You and I know the whole thing is perfectly respectable, but it might sound a little peculiar in a letter."

Thanks to our whitewashed accounts to our parents, they somehow conceived the idea we'd landed in a neighborhood group putting on amateur theatricals. "It sounds very informal and friendly, dear," mother wrote back.

It was all of that.

I'm not sure whether it was Arthur, heaven or our own impenetrable naïveté that guided us through the week of burlesque with very much the same effect as a schoolgirls' conducted tour of Radio City. Unlike the three bronze monkeys who perpetually grab their eyes, ears and mouths in an ostentatious attempt to shut out evil, we saw, heard and smelled the whole backstage life of burlesque and took in only what we understood, which was practically nothing.

Betty and the other members of Arthur's chorus had three tiny dressing rooms, four girls to a room, up several flights of iron stairs, as steep and breakneck as a ship's ladder. Sometimes I stood in the wings watching the girls run down the three flights in a quick, sure dash, with their tap shoes making a dandy din against the iron treads. If one of the comedians came down and said to me, "How are you today, dear?" I felt instinctively shy, but would murmur, "Very well, thank you." In the dressing room with Betty, I felt no such shyness. While the girls put on their stage make-up or sat around between numbers, we talked about clothes and our families, and tried on one another's hats.

But it was the dressing room of Peggy, the strip-tease queen, that attracted me most. Peggy was seventeen, and had started in the chorus a year before. Now she'd been the star for three months, with the star's dressing room all to herself, and I think she was lonely. She often called the chorus girls into her dressing room, usually on the pretext that she wanted them to see a new costume.

It was my good luck that Peggy particularly liked Betty, and where Betty went, I tagged along. Peggy's dressing room was always neat as a common pin, with her glittering costumes hung on a rack in one corner and three long-legged boudoir dolls propped in the exact center of three chairs. When we visited Peggy, we each carefully took up a doll, sat down on its chair, and held the doll in our laps while we talked. Our hostess had the same open-and-shut, incredibly blue eyes, and pale gold hair silkier than any doll's wig.

My strongest remembrance of Peggy is seeing her sit before her dressing-table mirror heating a stick of stage mascara over a blue gas flame and then beading her eyelashes with exquisite care, one by one, while she prattled on about her "folks." She told us her mother made all her costumes. "See, they gotta have very special fasteners so I can get out of them easy on stage." Betty and I agreed that her mother sewed beautifully, and it struck neither of us as odd that motherly fingers should sew in place the fasteners that aided strip-tease.

Peggy lived with her parents in Flushing, and told us she had already made the down payment on a new house and a five-passenger sedan. "Papa drives in every night to take me home," she said. "He chaperoons me all the time."

Aren't people funny? If you tell a man that there are 270,678,934,341 stars in the universe, he'll believe you—but if a sign says FRESH PAINT, that same man has to make personal investigation.

—H. V. Prochnow: The Public Speaker's Treasure Chest (Harper).

"Gosh," Betty said sympathetically. "Our parents aren't nearly that strict. Hildegarde and I can do anything we want to."

The strip-tease queen looked at us two Presbyterians enviously. "It must be swell not to be chaperooned," she said.

We were impressed to learn that Peggy was making a hundred dollars a week.

"It's respectable, steady work, not like night clubs," she explained. "In night clubs you hafta mix, and take a drink almost every night."

Seen in this light, Peggy's choice of burlesque as a career seemed to us the height of conservatism. At the moment, she was standing before us in a G-string, spreading a thick white liquid powder over every inch of her shapely anatomy.

"The chorus girls only have to put it on their legs," she complained. "But us strippers have to wear it all over us."

Once when she called us into her dressing room, she held out a box of candy.

"Look," she said excitedly. "Five pounds of assorted chocolates." She showed us the card that had come with them. It said, "You're beautiful," and was signed simply, "A college boy." Peggy kept turning the card around fondly. "I wish he'd have come backstage," she said. "I never been out with a college boy." She asked me if I had ever dated one, and my affirmative answer seemed to raise my stock tremendously. "Gee," she said. "Gee, if I was allowed out like you kids."

Once again Betty and I agreed that it was a shame for Peggy's parents to be so strict.

I have never seen Peggy since our one enchanted week, but I have often wondered how she made out, and if her papa ever let her go out with a college boy. I think it was her respectable influence that has always made Betty and me resent the slurs cast on burlesque by a doughty New York mayor or police commissioner.

After all, we think to ourselves indignantly, don't those men realize that burlesque is good, steady work, not like night clubs where girls hafta mix?

The brief taste of dancing behind footlights had whetted Betty's longing for a job, and she began making the rounds of theatrical agents.

My own career was at a standstill, or rapidly moving backward. I was now writing a weekly column on New York for the Franklin News-Herald, but the rewards were purely spiritual, and no money changed hands. Far from resenting this, I still feel affectionate gratitude toward my home-town paper, especially when I consider the dubious entertainment worth of the columns I turned in, on such red-hot news items as The Flower Show in Grand Central Palace.

Two weeks before Christmas I met a girl I'd known in Allegheny, Dorothy Ferrer, on Fifth Avenue. She said she'd been offered a selling job at McCreery's, but that since accepting it that morning she'd found a better job in another store.

"Why don't you go to McCreery's and tell the Personnel woman you'll take my place?" I objected on the grounds that I'd never sold anything, but Dorothy said, "Don't be silly. There's nothing to it."

The next day I was hired as a temporary Christmas helper to sell in McCreery's art section. "Art" turned out to be grass sewing baskets, embroidered pillows, fancy wastebaskets, crocheted mats and a few hundred other items of equal allure. I spent the first day attending classes in "How to Make Out a Sales-Slip. . . . How to Arrange for a Charge. . . . What to Do About C. O. D." The two latter methods sounded so involved that I decided there was only one feasible course: if a customer should say "Charge" or "C.O.D." to me, I'd abandon her in midstream.

Enough of Vows

By Marjorie Lederer

Enough of vows heavy with promise,
  Aeon-gray;
Eternity is better glimpsed
  In one bright day.

Enough of songs laden with measures
  Ten times heard;
Love was never meant for more
  Than one short word.

I have seen June glutted with roses
  Stampede the spring:
More than once has muchness killed
  A fragile thing.

When I say there may have been worse saleswomen than I somewhere in greater New York, I am indulging in pretty conceits. For one thing, I promptly developed a passion for the customers who said they were "just looking, thanks." I stuck to them happily and we all looked—at everything in the department. The longer they looked, the less apt they were to complicate my life by buying something and having me make out a sales slip. If a woman insisted on seeing a specific item, and the item happened to cost more than ninety-eight cents, I felt the most tremulous anxiety for her budget. "You don't want to spend five dollars for that wastebasket," I'd tell her. "We have lots of cheaper ones."

Our section manager learned to dread the sight of me. Almost hourly he had to rescue one of my sales checks from the wrong carrying tube, or void another sales slip I'd messed up beyond redemption. If a customer of mine waited a half hour for change, and it failed to materialize from the tube, the manager would say, "Now think, Miss Dolson. Where do you suppose you sent the money? Surely you wouldn't have marked a cash sale for the charge office." But he knew I would, and I knew it too.

After three days of this, Personnel sent for me and told me my services were no longer required. Perhaps never before or since has a McCreery Personnel woman been so warmly thanked by the employee she had just fired.

My next collision with the business world occurred when I became a cashier and assistant hostess in the men's Allerton House, dinners only. One of Mrs. Bellamann's vocal students had the job and wanted to go away for a few weeks, so I was called in to pinch-hit. The chief hostess in the dining room, Mrs. Brown, a handsome woman of perhaps forty-five, explained to me that the duties were very simple: just making change and gay conversation as the men went into and out of the dining room. "They live here, you know," she said, "and so they're not at all like strangers." With a significant look, she mentioned that another girl who once held this same job had married one of the customers, a very wealthy man. As she enlarged on this romance, I felt rather uneasy. When Mrs. Bellamann had described the job to me, she hadn't mentioned anything about marrying anybody.

As the men came into the dining room the first night, Mrs. Brown stood at my cashier's desk just inside the door and introduced each newcomer. My gay conversation was limited to a brief "How do you do?"

After the men had gone on to their tables, Mrs. Brown would murmur to me occasionally, "That man in the corner is motioning. Perhaps you'd better go see what he wants."

"Where?" I'd ask, peering..

I'm as nearsighted as a hoot owl, and although, smothering my vanity, I had told Mrs. Brown I'd be glad to put on my glasses, she had said, "Oh, no, dear, I hardly think ——" From then on, I felt pleasantly absolved of all worry about my shortcomings as an assistant hostess. Whenever Mrs. Brown said, "Oh, So-and-so is waving at you," or "Do smile back at that man," I would shake my head blankly. Three feet was my range. Let them come close if they wanted to be coy. Besides, it kept me busy counting on my fingers under the desk to make change, so why should I waste time waving toward a blur in the far corner?

One night the hostess brought up a youngish man and said he worked in a publishing house.

"Mrs. Brown tells me you want to be a writer," he said. He also asked me if I'd go dancing with him that Saturday night. When I hesitated, he added, "I know a lot of people in the publishing field and I could be quite a help to you."

This was my first experience with the type of synthetic wolf who attaches that "I can be a great help to your career, little girl" to an invitation. My backbone bristled. "I'm going to be busy," I said. "And I'm busy every night next week."

The man must have told Mrs. Brown, because from that time on she seemed to have given me up for lost. Here was a cashier who couldn't keep accounts, couldn't wave to the customers and didn't even have the decency to marry them. A total loss. It was a fine thing for the Allerton House—and the customers who wanted to be waved to—when the regular girl came back.

My instinct is to dismiss the year that followed by placing a row of asterisks right here. The trouble is that asterisks imply an interesting lapse, during which the heroine's mind went conveniently blank. It's true that my mind was blank during that period, but only because I had a job so respectably dull that it bored me stiff. When Betty decided to go home to Pennsylvania for the summer, I was still so little conscious of apple sellers and unemployment that I tossed over my weekly pay check and went along. The depression had reached out its octopus arms even to Franklin, but my parents welcomed me as warmly as if I'd come to lift the mortgage.

By late summer I was terribly homesick for New York. My parents were understandably dubious about my chances of getting a job there, but I insisted it would be a cinch. Hadn't I found jobs before? Finally I was allowed to embark with Betty, on a low-rate excursion ticket, with the understanding that if I didn't get a job in two weeks (when the ticket expired) I would use the return half to go home. To buoy my hopes, I had a new Empress Eugénie hat that cost $2.98 and hurtled down one side of my head as if I were riding to hounds. My other prize was a pair of lounging pajamas mother had made for me out of an old black velvet evening dress. Each leg was several feet wide, and magnificently floppy.

Betty and I had written Mrs. Little to reserve our old room, and when we arrived there I removed the Empress Eugénie hat, put on my lounging pajamas and leaned blissfully out the window, a cosmopolitan returned to her Broadway habitat in fitting raiment. I had also written a beau that I'd be back in town that day, and when the community phone rang, far down the corridor, I leaped up to answer it. In my haste, I somehow became so tangled up in my floppy pajama pants that I tripped and was thrown against the door head-first, with an awful thud. Even if a woman is mortally stricken, she'll manage to get to her feet to answer a ringing phone. Unfortunately, it turned out to be a feminine voice at the other end of the wire, asking for a Mr. Atkins. I had never seen Mr. Atkins, who was presumbably one of Mrs. Little's tenants, but at that moment I loathed him. "He's not here," I said meanly, and hung up.

By the time my own call came, an hour later, the results of my fall were rather apparent. My forehead was swelled out like a goose egg and below it was a black eye of amazing scope and hue. Betty and I worked on the eye with hot and cold washrags, with the blade of a knife held tenderly against the bruises, and finally with raw beef and butter. I still have no idea what the butter was for.

The next morning Betty insisted the eye looked much better, but even with a heavy overlay of powder, it was unmistakably a beaut of a black eye. My forehead was so swollen I couldn't bear to have the Empress Eugénie model tilted down pressing on it, so I wore the hat pushed up and on the back of my head, like a Broadway bookie's derby. The whole effect was incredibly raffish. As I started out on the round of employment agencies, Betty said, "Now remember, it isn't looks they care about. It's brains." If such brains as I possess had been visible to prospective employers, they wouldn't have been nearly so noticeable as the black eye.

In the next two weeks, I must have tramped over almost every block in New York. The depression was on full blast, there were a thousand applicants for every job, and of those thousands I was perhaps the only one with a brand-new shiner. When the harassed interviewers in employment agencies stared at my eye and said, "How on earth did you get it?" I always answered with simple truth, "I bumped into a door." I explained this dozens of times in that job-hunting period, and I was always baffled by the shrugs and smirks it occasioned. "You'd think they didn't believe me," I said to Betty indignantly.

As my black eye faded, so did my hopes. I rushed to every address given me by an agency, or discovered in the fast-shrinking Help Wanted columns, and came home each night with no job. On the fourteenth day, when my train was to leave that evening, I knew by five o'clock there was no reprieve. Betty and I went down the corridor to knock on Mrs. Little's door, so that I might say good-by to her.

Mrs. Little seemed genuinely sorry to have our twosome broken up. "You certainly picked a terrible time to look for a job," she told me. "And then getting that black eye."

I gulped and nodded. Her pink-cheeked, pleasant husband came in from work while we sat there, and he, too, was sympathetic.

Mrs. Little was saying something about a man who lived in one of her rooms and worked in a place that seemed to be booming. "I could ask him, but I don't think he'll be back here before you leave," she said. In my misery, I hardly heard her. I was trying not to disgrace myself by bawling.

A friend was coming to take us to dinner, and he and Betty would ride with me to the ferry. While I packed, Betty sat on the bed and tried to reassure me. "You'll come back in a month or so," she kept saying, in a would-be cheerful voice. Both of us knew there wasn't a chance.

I leaned out the window for one more look at Broadway. I was saying good-by to the automobile sign when a loud knock came at our door. Betty opened it and started to say "Hello, Henry," but stopped in surprise. Mrs. Little stood there beaming, beside a small, dirty-faced man in khaki overalls.

"This is Dave," Mrs. Little said. "He lives here and works in a picture-frame factory." She pointed to me. "This is the girl." The man in overalls looked at me silently. "Why don't you tell her?" Mrs. Little poked him gaily with her elbow. "Tell her you've got a job for her." She turned to me.

It is easier to visit friends than to live with them.

Travel may translate money into mind, but happy is he who has his own teacup to return to.

"It's only fifteen dollars a week. As a typist, in the factory. Would you take it?"

"Yes," I said. My knees shook so hard I had to sit down.

Dave, warmed by my wild gratitude, finally opened his mouth to give me the address of the Royal Frame Factory, the name of the manager, and told me to report at eight-thirty the next morning. When he and Mrs. Little left, my fond farewells echoed after them down the dark hallway.

Betty and I began to pull clothes out of my suitcase. "I'd better tear up my return ticket right now," I said. "Before that man changes his mind." I tore it into bits and we made a ceremony of throwing the pieces out the window, to fall like confetti on Broadway.

That first day of my new job still comes back in nightmares, to startle me out of smug sleep.

I had a clear, movie-tinged notion of what a factory would look like: a huge, functional building with floor after floor of gleaming machines, and outside the manager's private office my own mahogany secretarial desk. I had stayed up late laundering white collars and cuffs for my best black dress, so I'd look the part of a well-groomed typist.

Following Dave's instructions, I took the BMT subway downtown to Canal Street, then went on foot looking for 40 Broome. On a dirty, dark side street piled with boxes all along the sidewalk, I looked up at a number on a rickety wooden building and decided I'd taken down the wrong address. This was Broome Street, and this was No. 40, but obviously it couldn't be the factory. Puzzled, and hoping to get directions as to where in the neighborhood I might find the edifice I was looking for, I went inside the building and up a flight of creaky old stairs. At the top, I found myself in a narrow loft about the size of an ordinary living room, crammed with men in overalls, working at machines. The smell of banana oil was so heavy I held my nose with my white-gloved fingers.

I went over to the nearest man, tapped him politely on the arm, and said, "Please, do you know where I might find the Royal Frame Factory?"

"What?" he yelled.

This time I shouted my request.

He stared at me. "This is it."

I rocked on my feet. Weakly I leaned against something for support, and it swayed behind me. I staggered and turned to see that what I had leaned against was a high stack of picture frames. Two workers had grabbed them just in time to save them from toppling over. But nobody saved the things that were toppling in my head. I was suffering from the shock of reality.

Somebody shouted in my ear, "Oh, hello, so you found it all right." It was Dave, smiling all over his round, dirt-streaked face. "I'll show you your desk," he yelled. "The boss will be back in an hour."

The desk was jammed into a corner beside one of the screeching machines. It was covered with grimy papers, two unwashed milk bottles and gritty dust that kept whizzing from the planing machine beside it.

"Take off your hat and make yourself at home," Dave said.

I took off my hat, but I didn't know how to make myself at home. Home was never like this. While I sat there miserably, with the screeching machines tearing at my eardrums, another man in overalls, small, dark-skinned and with thick white hair, came over to my desk and smiled at me gently. He pushed the papers and milk bottles to one side, then pulled up the top of the desk and a typewriter came into view. "You want this, yes?" he asked.

Two minutes before I had been thinking, for the first and only time in my life, that it would be simple to jump out a window and kill myself. I wouldn't have done it, of course. It was a twenty-two-year-old's first violent, bewildered reaction to a new kind of world. Now I had a typewriter, a good, sane, solid typewriter to hold on to. After thanking the white-haired man, I found a blank, rather grimy piece of paper and began to type furiously. I must have typed the alphabet a thousand times before Dave came back with a tall, thin-faced man in a rather bright blue business suit and ordinary felt hat.

"Meet the boss," Dave said. "Mr. Harding."

THE man shook hands with me, then took off his hat and suit coat, tossed them on a pile of lumber, pulled a packing box up beside the desk, and sat down. His clipped way of talking was as economical as his motions. He showed me how to type a bill of lading for picture frames to be shipped out. It seemed simple enough. After a few minutes he said, "Call me if you want to ask questions," and walked away.

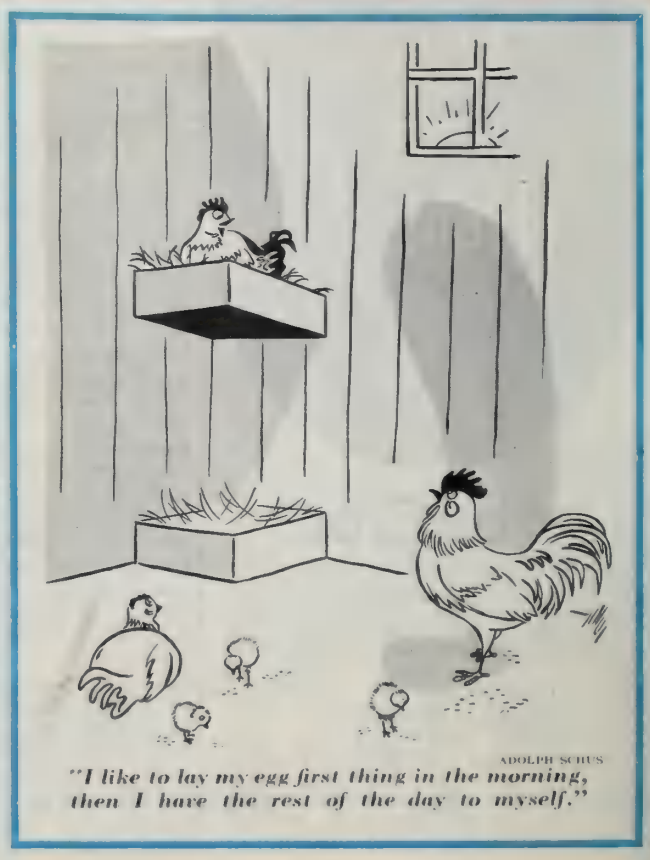
Now that I had something to do, the sickish smell of banana oil didn't bother me so much, but the noise was still awful. Every time the phone on the desk rang, I would clench the receiver to my ear, put a finger in the other ear and try desperately to hear through the din. Then I'd run for Mr. Harding. He always came promptly to answer the phone his new office girl couldn't cope with. "I can't hear a word," I would scream.

At noon there was suddenly a deafening quietness. Every machine had been turned off; the workers got out parcels of food wrapped in brown paper and started to eat. Three girls whom I now saw for the first time came out from behind a pile of corrugated-paper boxes and sat down with the men. They looked Spanish or Italian. The prettiest one had a rose in her hair, and they all wore cotton house dresses. I was enormously relieved to see some women, because it meant there must be a ladies' room. I sat there trying to get up enough courage to go over and ask them about it.

Just then Harding came to get his hat and coat, and told me to take an hour for lunch. He started out, then came back to the desk. "Like to have lunch with me at a good spaghetti place?" he asked. He was so business-like about it that I said yes without a second's hesitation. Besides, I love spaghetti.

"If you want to wash your hands, it's the door at the head of the stairs," Harding said.

IT was a cubicle containing a commode and a grimy washstand, but it seemed wonderful. After the morning I'd put in, I was humbly grateful for such refinements of life as a ladies' room.



We ate in a small Italian restaurant near the lower East Side. The spaghetti drove the banana-oil vapors out of my head, and Harding was easy to talk to. All I had to do was listen, and ask a few questions.

He was the kind of man who is passionately in love with a business. To him, the dirty little loft filled with machines and stacks of frames was a business, and I think it was essential to his vanity that even the new office girl should view the Royal Frame Factory with respect.

Perhaps he'd sensed my feelings, because he said, "This is only the beginning, this hole we're in now. We're moving to a bigger place next week." Harding told me that a big corporation owned the factory, a corporation which also owned the inexpensive-photograph studios in department stores all over the country. "See, they'll sell these dollar or two-dollar frames to the people who get their pictures taken for a dollar," he said. "It's a perfect setup, the kind that will beat the depression." Suddenly he said, "You've hardly touched your wine. It's good Italian wine. What's the matter with it?"

I hated to confess I wasn't used to drinking anything except milk, so I said hastily, "Oh, it's good," and took a large gulp. By the end of lunch, and a few more gulps of wine, I'd worked up enough courage to tell my boss he'd have to answer his own telephone. It seemed to amuse him.

"So you can't stand a little noise," he said, grinning. "I'll bet you got a college sheepskin, and you can't even answer the phone. "Why doesn't a girl like you run home to mamma?" he asked. "Wouldn't your folks like you to be home?"

I said yes, they would, but I wanted to stay in New York to learn to be a writer.

He nodded. "O.K., kid. At least you're stubborn. I thought at first you were a stuck-up college snip."

When he learned I'd left school before being graduated, it seemed to please him even more.

Walking back to the factory, he said, "I haven't time for the office work any more. You can keep the books and ——"

"Keep the books!" I repeated blankly. "You mean bookkeeping? But I don't know how."

"You'll learn," he said easily. "Nothing to it. I'll teach you some afternoon after we move to the new place."

Even with the wine floating fuzzily in my head, I felt a sudden, sharp sympathy for poor Mr. Harding, who thought he could teach me bookkeeping in one day. He sounded the way my physics teacher had before I broke his spirit.

That first afternoon, some belated instinct from my Dutch ancestors came to the front and made me "redd up" that four square feet of the factory which I occupied. Perhaps it was simply an instinct of self-preservation, to make myself a tidy little island in the midst of the noise and dirt.

Humming to myself like a prim little housewife, and rather loopy on a half glass of wine, I bustled about setting my island in order. I threw away the dirty milk bottles, piled up the sooty papers into neat stacks, and flicked my handkerchief over the desk top. It must have been the wine that encouraged me to dump everything out of the desk drawers and salvage only those items which looked to me businesslike, such as carbon paper and erasers.

Harding came along just in time to rescue what I thought were silly old scraps of wood from the wastebasket. "These are my only samples of frame moldings." he said.

I said I didn't want all that junk in my desk, and that I needed space to put away the bills of lading. "I want them to be clean," I insisted.

Harding looked rather dazed, but he got a box and told me to put all the things I didn't want into it. "I guess we'd better get you a secondhand filing cabinet," he said, "if you want to be so neat."

By the end of the third day I could hear enough to answer the telephone. Compared with that problem, the rest of the work seemed simple. Whenever I wasn't busy, I roamed around watching the men make frames—sawing, planing, hammering, shellacking or mottling. In this last process, they sprayed the frame with gilt or silver paint, and then dabbed at the wet frame with a rag, to achieve a spotty effect of light and dark. Privately, I thought the frames would have looked nicer plain, but I liked to watch the men mottle, with fast, sure dabs, hardly looking at the frame until they held it up finished. Their overalls were splattered with exotic dabs of gold or silver, and above them were the white, smiling teeth in dark-skinned faces. I discovered that my white-haired friend of the first day, whom everybody called Little Joe, was the foreman. Most of the workers' names were long and fancy in the pay-roll book, but they used only first names in talking to one another.

On my fourth day, Maria, the prettiest of the three Spanish girls, came to my desk to make a phone call while Harding was at lunch. When she'd finished, she smiled brilliantly, said, "Gracias, 'Ildegarde," and ran away fast. After that everybody called me Hildegarde. In spite of my debut in the frothy white cuffs, they had forgiven me my sheltered past.

I think it was a form of initiation when, as I went out to lunch one noon that first week, one of the Spanish boys held out a half loaf of bread cut into two pieces like a sandwich, with something between as a filler. "Very good," he said. "Like to taste?" He was polite but insistent.

I took one small bite and thought my whole mouth was on fire. Whatever was in that sandwich was the hottest, strongest stuff that has ever scorched my palate. "It's g-g-g-ood," I gasped. My eyes were bulging and my tongue hung out like a dog's. Maria ran to get me water, and everybody laughed heartily as I alternately swallowed and panted. My hazing was complete.

At the end of two weeks, we moved to the new factory. It was another loft, but about six times as big as the old one, and in a less rickety building. To my newly adjusted eyes, it looked fine. My desk was moved over on a Saturday morning, and since I had Saturday afternoons off, I went to meet Betty, leaving Harding and the workers setting up the machines and work tables. They promised to put my desk near a window. When I came back on Monday morning, I stepped off the freight elevator which went up to our new fourth-floor loft, and blinked in amazement. I was standing in an honest-to-goodness office. The men had marked off a good-sized corner of the loft and built plasterboard walls, with a door leading into the factory. There was my desk with a rose sitting in a paper cup (I recognized Maria's feminine touch) and beside the desk a tall, battered green filing cabinet. It was all so wonderful I just stood there gaping.

Harding walked in and grinned. "The boys fixed it up Sunday. They wanted to surprise you."

At least ten of the twenty workers followed Harding into the office to see how I'd taken the surprise. A few of them spoke almost no English, but that day we all understood one another beautifully. Like amo, amas, amat, happiness needs no interpreter.

In letters to my parents, the factory acquired a size and gloss that partly reassured them. Harding had raised my salary to sixteen dollars at the end of the second week, and this made a fine, prosperous piece of news to send home. Allowing six dollars a week for rent, and eight dollars for breakfasts, lunches, dinners, subway fare and even more important essentials such as silk stockings and lipstick, I still had two dollars a week for riotous living, or having a wisdom tooth pulled.

I was living alone now. A few weeks after I'd gone to the factory, Betty's mother, one of the most charming women I've ever known, became very ill, and Betty left New York to spend six months in Meadville. When she returned, she immediately took a job with a vaudeville unit, to go on the road. While she sampled one-night stands in Punxsutawney and points west, I was wedged like a folding ironing board into the smallest quarters at Mrs. Little's, with no view of Broadway—or, indeed, of anything. Instead of a window, there was a small ventilating shaft that opened onto a pitch-black courtyard. Lying in bed, I could reach out and touch everything in the room.

When my mother came to New York for a visit the next year, and I proudly showed her my room, she murmured, "Oh, darling!" Then she hurried out to the hallway, ostensibly to make a telephone call, and came back red-eyed but cheerful. Both she and my father would have liked to have me at home, but they never denied me the right to choose. It must be awfully tough for parents not to run interference when their children, grown up, are learning once more to walk by themselves.

That second month of the new job I was also learning bookkeeping. Orders for frames were coming into the factory so fast that Harding now had forty workers to supervise, and he spent all his time with them. Little by little I was learning to handle all the office work: making out freight records, writing letters, filing, and so on. When Harding said it was high time I learned to keep the books, I knew we were both in for a bad period.

Since he was too busy ever to go out to lunch, and always had a Swiss-cheese sandwich brought in around two o'clock, my first lessons took place while he ate his cheese-on-rye in the office. Between bites, he'd point to an open ledger and say, "Now look, you draw a thousand dollars out of the bank, so that's a debit." This logic mystified me utterly. To me, a thousand dollars drawn out of a bank was a credit any girl might well be proud of.

In a way, my incredible dumbness rather gratified Harding, because it confirmed his scornful belief that colleges never taught anything worth knowing. In judging all students by me, he was certainly doing colleges an awful injustice. The day he told me he'd ordered an adding machine, and I asked hopefully if he couldn't get one that subtracted instead, his opinion of higher learning hit a sodden new low.

I still remember with awe that I made the Royal Frame Company's monthly accounts balance, although to this day I can't tell the difference between a debit and a credit. Any woman, when faced by the bared teeth of necessity, invents fearful and wonderful systems for achieving her goal. As I worked on the ledgers, my own thinking process was part woman, part monkey. Let's see, I'd say to myself. If Harding subtracted this thing from that thing last month, I guess I may as well subtract too. And if Depreciation of Machinery is added in the credit column, then maybe the thing on the next page is a debit. The first time the two sets of figures came out even, I stared unbelievingly, as if I'd just brought off the miracle of the twentieth century.

Waving the ledger, I rushed through the office door into the factory yelling, "Harding! Look!"

My boss came on the run. "Fire?" he panted. "Where?" In a place filled with inflammable paints and flimsy wood frames, that was a constant worry.

The news that I'd struck a trial balance came as rather an anticlimax.

Every Tuesday morning I went to the big executive offices uptown to collect the check for our pay roll. Then I'd come back to the bank on Canal Street and get it cashed into the proper amounts of bills and silver, usually over a thousand dollars. The teller at the bank would cram all this into my purse, and I'd start for the side streets that led to the factory. This last stage of the journey made me a little nervous. In the months since I'd come to work, there had been five holdups in that same neighborhood, where the narrow, dark streets, the sidewalks piled high with boxes, and the empty warehouses made ideal hiding places for thugs. When the girl who worked in the building next door was hit over the head with a blackjack, while carrying a pay roll, I complained mildly to Harding that I ought to have an escort. He said he couldn't spare one of the boys, and that I was perfectly safe. However, he agreed magnanimously that if any gunman held me up I didn't have to argue with him. "Just drop the money and run," he said.

Any lurking holdup men who saw me trotting up the street at eleven-thirty every Tuesday morning must have said to themselves comfortably, "Now there's one moron nobody in his right mind would choose to carry a pay roll." If they noticed my bulging purse, they must have thought it full of cookies.

It was just after my twenty-third birthday that I decided to write a piece for The New Yorker magazine. As a connoisseur of rejection slips, I thought it was high time to add one of theirs to my collection. After writing the story, I stuck it untitled into an envelope and took it to a post box. Feeling vaguely that some kind of ceremony was necessary, I kissed the thing for luck. Afterward I swaggered home thinking, You've just sent a piece to the magazine Robert Benchley writes for.

Four weeks later I decided the manuscript had been lost. At the end of six weeks, I'd forgotten it completely. On a Saturday morning (yes, dear, grandma remembers as if it were yesterday) I picked up some mail as I wended my sleepy way out to the subway. Why, The New Yorker used one of its own envelopes to send the piece back in, I said to myself. Aren't they nice? As every young writer knows, it gets awfully boring always to receive envelopes back in your own handwriting.

I must have sat in the subway at least five minutes before it occurred to me that the unopened letter felt awfully thin. What had become of my manuscript?

Five seconds later I was holding a slip of blue paper at which I stared stupidly. "Payable to —— Fifty dollars ——"

The world blurred before my eyes, and I groped for the note that came with this blue mirage. " —— which we've titled Bus Journey . . . and we hope you'll send us lots more. Sincerely, K. S. WHITE."

My first impulse was to leap off the subway, rush back to my room and put every manuscript I owned into envelopes, to send this divine being called K. S. White. After this feverish flush had subsided, I looked around the subway car at all the faces. I had to tell somebody the news, but even in my delirium I was too shy to open a conversation with a stranger. If only one of them would ask me a leading question. I held the check almost under the nose of the woman sitting next to me, hoping she'd say "Excuse me, but is that really a check from The New Yorker magazine?" That was all I needed—just one opening question—but the woman only looked out the window.

At Canal Street, I ran all the way from the subway to the nearest Western Union office, where I wired the family my news. When I got to the factory, each of the forty workers took turns handling and admiring my check, although I was a little nonplused that none of them had ever heard of The New Yorker. Maria said, "But maybe someday you sell story to True Confessions, yes?" She was eager to have me get into the big time.

Whenever a salesman came into the office that morning, Harding had me get out the check and display it. Even the expressman was treated to a peek. For the first and only time, my boss viewed me as he would a new frame—a credit to the factory that had raised me. I had sold a bunch of useless words at a net profit of fifty dollars, and no visible depreciation of machinery.

(THE END)

SECRETARY TO MR. BLUEBEARD

Julie stared at him. For one insane moment she wondered why one cup wasn't enough—he had only one head, so far as she could see. Did the man actually think she would calmly bring a cup for herself and propose to sit down in his private office to drink tea with him? But that was exactly what he meant.

"Can't you find a cup for yourself?" he demanded hospitably. Julie had reached the door when he called after her, "By the way, Miss Danton, the U stands for Underhill."

"What?" she gasped, whirling around.

"The U stands for Underhill," he repeated with a distinct twinkle. "After all, nothing should be hidden from a man's secretary."

The atmosphere in the office was different after that. Not that Mr. Ferrier was exactly chummy, but Julie felt that some sort of barrier had fallen. She had a sense that not only did she herself feel a sort of partner to her boss, but actually that he also felt her more of a partner than a secretary. She came to the astounding conclusion that Mr. Ferrier was even a bit shy. It took him a very long time before he began tentatively to call her Julie.

"And why shouldn't he?" she replied firmly to the tittering secretaries who had overheard him. "He's not so very much older than I am, you know, and I've been with him for a year. Lots of men call their secretaries by their first names. I even know secretaries who call their boss by his first name—when they're alone together," she added hastily.

"Oh, you'd never dare call him Thomas!" the girls shrieked.

"Well, no," Julie admitted. "I think 'Tuffy' suits him better, anyway."

Definitely at the end of her first year with Mr. Ferrier, Julie drew a deep breath and decided she was entitled to a little egotism. Here she had licked the head of the department into a working partnership; she had found herself a nice little apartment in Alexandria—a marvel in itself; Washington might be full of entirely too many girls, but there was no man shortage so far as Julie was concerned. She allowed herself the luxury of feeling superior.

Then, suddenly, it was spring again, and here was Julie prancing into her office in the full glory of a new spring suit, to find Mr. Ferrier actually standing looking out his window and doing nothing at all. Amazingly, he didn't look like Tuffy, but just a terribly, terribly tired young man gazing wistfully out at a spring day.

Julie suddenly realized that Mr. Ferrier hadn't had a vacation in at least two and a half years that she could account for, and heaven knows how long before that. She thought of all the Sundays and holidays and nights he had worked and the terrific job of organization he had accomplished. His home, she knew, was in Texas, but even on his business trips he had never had time to see his parents. It struck her forcibly that even soldiers get furloughs in which to go out and raise a little Cain, but Mr. Ferrier hadn't had a minute even to go to a movie.

"Hello, Julie," he said as she came in with the mail. "Did you ever go to the Smithsonian Institution?"

"Why, no," she replied, staring at him in astonishment.

"I just thought perhaps you had been," he said humbly. "That's where they have the Spirit of St. Louis, you know."

"No. I haven't had any time for sightseeing. I did rather want to get to the National Gallery sometime, but I can't quite make it at lunch hour."

"A great mistake," he told her firmly. "Here you are, in the capital of your country, surrounded by galleries and museums full of the essence of America. You should take every advantage of your opportunity to absorb the culture and history of your native land."

"WHAT opportunity?" she demanded with some acidity. "I have one free day a week—Sunday. And on Sunday I clean house and wash clothes and mend stockings and write letters. I also try to get a little rest. As far as culture and history are concerned, I might as well be back in Hollyville."

"Hollyville?" he repeated. "What's that?"

"My home in Vermont, where I existed before I came to this seat of intellectual enlightenment," she replied snappishly.

Tuffy looked at her five feet of blond belligerence and, surprisingly, grinned impishly at her. "Don't be bitter, Julie," he advised. "It doesn't become you. Since you feel the lack of cultural development so keenly, would you care to join me in playing hooky today and exhibit that beautiful new suit to the National Gallery?"

Julie stared at him, open-mouthed, and gurgled slightly.

"Close your mouth," he requested politely. "It's much prettier that way. What is the matter with you?" he added with faint irritation. "It's certainly perfectly proper for a man to go sight-seeing with his secretary once in a year."

Julie closed her mouth with a slight snap. "It certainly is," she agreed sweetly. "I can think of nothing more blameless than an afternoon at the Smithsonian or trudging through the Library of Congress."

"Then would you like to powder your nose and telephone your duenna while I get my hat?" he inquired with a twinkle.

"Would you be insulted if I said I didn't think it necessary to inform my duenna?" she asked thoughtfully.

He stared at her for a minute and then shouted with laughter. "Touché," he said approvingly. "In that case, what are we waiting for?"

"What, indeed?" she murmured dazedly.

With one long arm Mr. Ferrier scooped up his hat and crammed it on his head; with the other he grabbed her elbow and pushed her out of the office.

Once downstairs and sharing a taxi with a sailor and a harassed civilian, Julie was overcome by a spasm of disbelief.

Lawkamussy me, she thought. Can this be I? Riding in a taxi with Tuffy on pleasure bent? Impossible! What about that pile of mail? What about the appointments for today?

SHE cast a glance at her boss, who was apparently a prey to no doubts whatever. He sat uncomfortably on one of the small seats and sniffed the fresh air out of the taxi window like nothing so much as a big Airedale enjoying his first motor trip of the season. Julie made a sudden decision that the office could go hang. Mr. Ferrier hadn't had a day off in ages, and if he wanted to run away to do a little sight-seeing, Julie was the girl to take his mind off things.

She later came to the conclusion that if anyone's mind was taken off things, it was hers. Tuffy needed no particular help in arranging a day to suit himself. He fed her a delicious second breakfast, whizzed her over to the Smithsonian and back to the Mayflower for lunch. Later he led her through the National Gallery, and just as she thought neither her feet nor her nerves would stand much more, she found herself relaxing over tea. She wiggled her toes comfortably and smiled at Tuffy.

"How do you feel?" he asked companionably.

"Like the Gilbert and Sullivan character who went to bed each night with the gratifying feeling that his duty was well done," she replied. "At last I can write to my family and assure them that life in the big city is broadening."

"You don't talk like a Vermonter," he observed.

"I'm not really. Originally I came from New York, but after I finished college my brother and sister got married and then dad retired. He and mother wanted to live in the country, and we had a farm in Vermont where we used to spend our summers, so they just moved up there permanently."

"Where did you go to college?"

"Vassar," she replied.

"Really? I had a cousin who went to Vassar. Perhaps you knew her—Joan Clarke?"

"Is your cousin Joan Clarke?" she gasped. "I should say I did know her." Julie dimpled all over. "She and I got into more trouble," she reminisced happily.

"She's married, you know. Her husband's in the Army and she and her son are home in Dallas."

"Has she a son?" Julie shrieked. "What's his name? When did it happen? Tell me all about her." Gone was any vestige of awe of Mr. Ferrier. To Julie he was simply Joan's cousin, Tuffy.

Afterward she dated the change in her life from that moment. There is quite a difference between a nice girl who happens to be your secretary and a nice girl who is your secretary and also an old friend of your favorite cousin. Although Tuffy continued to live up to his name during office hours, there was a definite and increasing spirit of camaraderie between him and Julie. For some time they had shared lunches and dinners when the press of work kept them overtime, but now Tuffy fell into the habit of asking Julie casually to have dinner or go to a concert at odd moments quite unconnected with business.

The outstanding proof of Tuffy's appreciation of Julie was his informing her that he had to attend a most important conference in New York and had decided to take her with him. "You're the only person I can ıst to get everything down straight," he d her. "These secretaries they have for nferences don't know beans from buttons, d I've got to have a really accurate ınscript. Sorry it has to be such short tice, Julie, but if you could manage to ıg some things into a suitcase and meet me the train in an hour?"

Get out to Alexandria and pack and re-rn in an hour? It couldn't be done, but lie did it somehow. All the way to New ork they worked: letters, reports, mem-anda—everything was down in Julie's little otebooks.

"Where do you want me to transcribe all is?" she asked feebly.

"We'll go over to Colter's office and bor-w a typewriter for you from one of his sec-taries," he told her. "Take a letter to the ındhill people, please."

New York was a confused impression of fices, strange desks and people for the next o days. Julie worked like a Trojan and as rewarded the second day by the gift of e evening to herself. Mr. Ferrier was go-g to a dinner party the Colters', he in-rmed her. She might well take a night f and go to a movie.

"Get a good night's eep, more likely," ıe retorted.

The third morning ıe was ensconced in olter's office, finish-ıg up the notes left om the day before. Ir. Ferrier did not ppear. Julie cleared p her desk, sharp-ıed her pencils and ung around aim-essly, wondering here he was and hat he expected her o do next. Lunch-me arrived with no ord from him, so ulie put on her hat nd decided to get an arly lunch in order o be ready for the robable afternoon onference.

In the elevator she ncountered Mr. Col-er. He looked at her lankly and said, 'Er—good morning, Miss—er ——"

"Good morning, Mr. Colter," she re-lied. "Can you tell ne what time Mr. Ferrier will want me or the conference?"

"Mr. Ferrier?" he said in astonishment. 'But my dear young lady, the conferences re over. Mr. Ferrier took the midnight rain back to Washington last night."

"Last night?" she repeated incredulously.

"Did he expect you to finish something p here today?" Mr. Colter inquired po-itely.

"I haven't the faintest idea," she replied wearily. "I think he just forgot me."

Mr. Colter looked at her sharply. "Come back to my office," he suggested, "and we'll telephone him."

When the call had gone through, Julie said "Hello, Mr. Ferrier," and got no further.

Tuffy's irate voice barked at her savagely, "Julie, what's the matter with you? If you were going to stay away from the office today, you might have called a little earlier. Where are you?"

Julie's temper got the better of her. "I am in New York," she informed him with icicles in her voice, "where you left me. In Mr. Colter's office, to be precise, and telephoning at his expense. In my purse at this moment I have ten dollars and twenty-three cents. My hotel bill, which you also conveniently forgot, amounts to something over thirty dollars, and if you want a secretary, you'd better come up and bail me out. I'll keep in touch with Mr. Colter until I hear from you," and she hung up.

Mr. Colter surveyed her irate figure with amusement. "You have courage, Miss —er— Julie," he remarked gently. "I know of only one other woman who had the nerve to talk back to one of the Ferrier men. Incidentally, she became Tom's mother."

The telephone rang. "Yes," said Mr. Colter, "she's here. . . . For you," he said, handing the instrument to Julie.

"Yes?" she snapped.

"Julie," said Tuffy's pleading voice, "don't desert me. I swear I'm sorry. I called the office last night and something had come up about the Lewisburg contract, so I thought it would save time to come down last night. I never thought about you. Have you really got only ten dollars and twenty-three cents?"

"That's all," she replied coldly.

He groaned. "Ask Colter to lend you some. No, I'll speak to him when we finish. And please come back as soon as you can. Take a plane if you can get one. I can't find a thing without you. I'm losing my mind, I think. These blankety-blank phones have been sounding off like fire alarms all morning. I can't hear myself think. Say you'll forgive me?"

"Oh, I suppose so," she commented. "At least it shows you've led a clean life if you're so unused to women you can leave them around casually at hotels. Do you want to talk to Mr. Colter?"

Julie was so glad to see her own desk the following morning that she nearly wept. She was busily sorting mail when the door opened to admit a strange brunette. Julie's quick eye appraised the newcomer as two inches taller, ten pounds heavier and quite a bit younger than herself. A soft cloud of dark brown hair framed the heart-shaped face almost devoid of make-up. Pretty child, Julie thought, smiling.

"Yes?" she said aloud. "Can I help you?"

"Oh," said the girl in a soft little voice, "are you Miss Danton?"

"Yes." Julie looked inquiry.

"I'm Betsy Lewis. Stenographic sent me down yesterday afternoon to handle the phones."

"How did things go?" Julie asked.

"Everything was all right. Mr. Ferrier was out almost all afternoon. He gave me a memorandum before he left, but there wasn't anything to do but answer the phones."

"That's good. Thanks for taking over for me," Julie said in dismissal. To her surprise, Betsy settled herself quietly in a chair. "You needn't wait," Julie told her. "I'll be here for the rest of the day."

"I think I'd better," Betsy replied with gentle obstinacy. "Mr. Ferrier said he wanted to see me this morning."

She was still sitting quietly in a corner when Mr. Ferrier came whirling into the office.

"Hello, Julie," he said with a sheepish grin. "How was the trip down?"

"I survived," she told him dryly, following him into his office with the mail. "You owe Mr. Colter seventy-five dollars."

"I swear I don't know how I came to do such a thing," he said apologetically. "Forgive me, Julie?"

Cut Mor into 8 slices. Melt ½ tbsp. fat, add Mor and brown on both sides.

Meanwhile, prepare pancake batter from your favorite recipe. Add 1 cup fresh blueberries (or freshly thawed frozen berries) and bake on griddle.*

Half the trick of baking pancakes easily is having the griddle at the right temperature . . . a drop of water should form a ball and "dance" on the griddle. If water flattens out, griddle is too cool; if water vanishes in steam, griddle is too hot.*

Here are two taste-tempters that require little preparation, yet promise lots of satisfaction. Cooking with MOR is gratifying . . . you're always certain of good results. Nutritious and delicious, too. MOR has all the important proteins, vitamins and minerals of sweet, tender pork shoulder meat.

Remember, MOR is the meat that's different. With the first mouth-watering bite you realize that here's the canned meat that has something . . . something about its fineness of flavor that suggests a master's touch.

It's different

RECIPE

1 can Mor
¼ cup fat
¼ cup minced onion
¼ cup diced red pepper
¼ cup diced green pepper
8 Clear Brook Eggs
salt and pepper

Dice the Mor and brown lightly in the fat, adding the onion and peppers the last few minutes. Add slightly beaten Clear Brook Eggs and cook over moderate heat until lower portion is set and slightly browned. Turn and continue cooking until lower portion is again set. Sprinkle with salt and pepper and serve hot between slices of buttered bread. Serves 8.

Early and Advanced Signs of
"TISSUE STARVATION"

XEROSIS CONJUNCTIVAE. Note thickening and discoloration of the "whites" of the eyes. An advanced "Tissue Starvation," producible by a prolonged lack of vitamins.

USUAL VITAMIN DEFICIENCY of eye tissues. Eye tissues should not be "muddy" or cloudy-looking when in perfect health, but bluish-white and with a translucent clarity.

"TISSUE STARVATION" is producible by a lack of vitamins in the living cells of your body— Its signs often appear first in Eyes, Skin and Mouth

IN MANY minds, vitamins are merely units in food. That's a half-truth—because vitamins are part and parcel of body tissues, too. What's more, those tissues may show signs of "Tissue Starvation" if they lack vitamins!

You may have a "Tissue Starvation" even if overweight. Medical reports say that thousands of Americans DO exhibit marks of "Tissue Starvation," producible by a deficiency of vitamins.

The photo at the left above shows an advanced case of "Tissue Starvation" rare in the U. S. A. But the right-hand sign is not unusual, nor are such evidences as gum and lip lesions. These signs, of course, may result from such conditions as irritation, infection or other malnutrition, but "Tissue Starvation" due to vitamin deficiency is a frequent and basic cause. To help prevent this form of "Tissue Starvation," you should take multiple vitamins—take ALL the known needed vitamins, not just one or a few. One-A-Day (brand) Multiple Vitamins bring you vitamins A, $B_1$, $B_2$, C and D, plus Niacin, Calcium Pantothenate and $B_6$—all in a single capsule.

THE MILES PLAN
for health protection

1. PROPER DIET. Vitamin deficiencies may accrue gradually in the body tissues throughout your entire life. So try to eat a balanced diet every day from now on.

2. PROTECTIVE VITAMINS. Take one capsule of Miles One-A-Day Multiple Vitamins every day.

3. CONDITIONING FACTORS. Certain conditions and habits (diarrhea, over-indulgence, etc.) increase vitamin needs. Protect yourself then by taking extra vitamins.

4. SEE YOUR DOCTOR—if you think you have lesions—as above—that indicate vitamin deficiency.

"Yes, of course," she replied, "although I shall never trust you again. Thank heaven you didn't take me to California. . . . There's a Miss Lewis waiting to see you," she told him.

"Miss Lewis?" he repeated, wrinkling his forehead. "Oh, Betsy Lewis," he remembered with a grin. "Yes. I've decided you ought to have an assistant, Julie. She seems quite intelligent. Put through the papers for her transfer." He beamed at her proudly.

Julie was completely taken aback. "But I don't need an assistant," she argued.

"Yes, you do," he replied firmly. "You're working entirely too hard. The office has expanded enormously and I don't want you to break down from overwork."

"But what will I do with her?" she protested.

"She can do the filing and help with the phones and—and run errands," he said vaguely. "Take a lot of petty routine off your shoulders. She might even help with the typing and shorthand. You fix it up with Stenographic and bring the papers to me for signature."

"Yes, Mr. Ferrier," she murmured, retreating to the outer office. "It seems Mr. Ferrier thinks you would make a suitable assistant to me," she told the girl. "You must have done very well indeed yesterday. He isn't an easy person to please."

Betsy's face lighted up with pleasure. "Shall I start right away?" she asked eagerly.

"Well, I suppose so," Julie said, nonplused. "You can get the papers for your transfer made out first," she planned, "and then I'll show you how to do the filing and where to find things."

At the end of the day she had to admit Betsy seemed intelligent and very willing, although teaching her what to do was far more tiresome than doing it herself. Julie did not like to repress the girl, but it was terribly distracting to have another person in her small office. By the time another desk and chair had been squeezed in there wasn't room enough to swing a cat endways, and while Betsy was not exactly a chatterer, she was inclined to sociability. She had a pleasant, light, rather vapid little voice, and her occasional friendly remarks were more than a little nerve-racking.

But I can't expect her to sit in solemn silence for eight hours every day, thought Julie when a naïve little observation had caused her to lose her count in a long list of figures she was totaling. Oh, dear, I wonder if I could tactfully get rid of her.

But when she brought the mail in for signature in the afternoon, Mr. Ferrier asked with some eagerness how Betsy was making out. Julie was conscious of a slight jolt at his use of the girl's first name. It took him months to get around to calling me Julie, she thought as she told him Betsy seemed very willing.

"Good!" he said with great satisfaction. "As soon as you get her trained to the routine, let's try her on some of the correspondence. She didn't seem to have any difficulty with the memo she took yesterday."

So Julie added a training course for Betsy to her other duties. Gradually she got used to the girl's presence, and as Betsy relieved her of more and more detail, Julie began to be quite fond of her. It was almost impossible not to be fond of her, in fact. Her artless little confidences, her naïve expressions of admiration for Julie and her extravagant attachment for Tuffy were all irresistible. Her parents lived in Pennsylvania, it developed. She was twenty-three and an only child, and she had come to Washington to stay with an aunt. She was fond of dancing, the movies and Frank Sinatra. Practically all the boys she knew were away in the Army or Navy; but, she informed a startled Julie, they seemed like such infants, such mere babies, when one compared them to a man like Mr. Ferrier.

"When I think," she said impressively, fixing Julie with her wide dark eyes, "that I was good enough for Mr. Ferrier to actually for did she confine her feelings to Julie's alone: with the utter unself-consciousness kitten, she informed Tuffy with a word e and a phrase there of the great privilege ad bestowed on her. Under this flatter- appreciation Tuffy beamed and unfolded a sunflower in a Kansas field. He was sh with his praise of Betsy's efforts and k her to lunch casually on several occa- s when Julie was engaged. "It isn't good you to eat alone, Betsy. Come along and buy you a chicken sandwich." When she he to the office one day dressed for a cial dinner engagement in a charming le velvet dress, he stood in the middle of office and made Betsy stand up and turn und so he could appre- e the full effect.

Very nice," he nodded. think I'll tie a big red in bow around your k, Betsy, and enter in the cat show. You'd ely take a prize for best gora kitten."

"Oh, Mr. Ferrier!" she protested with a giggle; and when he had gone into his ce, saying he would order five yards of satin ribbon immediately, she turned to ie with eyes like stars. "Oh," she athed, "isn't he sweet? I'll just love this ss forever!"

Hero worship, thought Julie worriedly as made appropriate rejoinders.

Altogether Betsy seemed to be exactly at the office had been needing for a long ile. Willing and conscientious, she was haps not very quick; but with Julie carry- the complicated reports and conference tes, she was a great assistance. Definitely spirit of peace and harmony prevailed. en Tuffy bade fair to lose his nickname, he was as meek as a lamb for a whole nth. Julie was able to give a satisfactory ort to Anne McConnell when she lunched th the personnel manager.

Anne cleared her throat nervously and looked down at her plate. "Is there any truth in this story that Mr. Ferrier insisted on having her in his office?" she inquired tentatively.

"Well, I wouldn't say he insisted," Julie replied. "Apparently she filled in very satisfactorily the day I was out and he thought she'd be a good assistant for me. I don't think anyone else wanted her, did they?"

"Oh, no," Anne said quickly, "but you know how gossip starts, and she's really very pretty."

"Gossip?" Julie stared. "What gossip?"

"The grapevine says he's interested in more than business," Anne confessed uncomfortably. "They based it on his putting her into the office so suddenly, I believe, and they've been seen lunching together."

"How absurd!" Julie exclaimed. "She's just a baby; and besides, he's been seen lunching with me, if it comes to that."

"Well, obviously it's just a story," Anne replied with relief. "I'll just spread it about that there's not a word of truth in it."

Julie was very thoughtful over this conversation. A number of things occurred to her which seemed ominous on closer inspection. Tuffy's use of Betsy's first name the day Julie had come back from New York; his constant praise and encouragement; his joke about entering Betsy in the cat show. The lunches were easily explained, but Julie remembered an evening when they had worked late and all three had dined together. She had left them after dinner, and the next day Betsy had informed her with glee that Mr. Ferrier hadn't taken her home right away. Instead he'd asked her if she'd like to go to a movie and had taken her to see Frank Sinatra. At the time Julie had thought, Poor Tuffy! He must have hated it. Now she was not so sure. If he had not wanted to be alone with Betsy, he would have suggested the movie while they were all together at the dinner table. The most ominous thought of all was his continued sweet temper. Julie could not recall a real rage since Betsy's arrival.

On the other side of the ledger was Betsy's professed admiration, esteem and love for Mr. Ferrier. Julie had put it down to the ordinary circumstance of a young girl's attachment to her boss, and Tuffy was undeniably handsome in a beetling sort of way. Other thoughts came to mind at this point, however: Betsy's repeated expectation of marriage; her preference for a husband older than herself. ("Someone who can teach me things. Boys are fun to dance with, but I want to marry a man who's settled down. I don't want my babies to have a jitterbug for a father.") Originally Julie had thought Betsy showed she had a head on her shoulders in wanting someone substantial to balance her own featherweight, but perhaps it was not simply any older man Betsy wanted, but Tuffy.

Well, she can't have him, said Julie decisively as she concluded her reflections—and caught herself up short. After all, why not? Because it's unsuitable, Julie told herself speciously. She's only twenty-three and he's at least thirty-five.

Honesty forced her to admit that twelve years was not too grave a difference. A girl like Betsy was bound to marry someone much older than herself, and to become a perfect, petted, adoring wife. Julie's heart sank to the bottom of her shoes. There could be only one reason why she should be so shocked and unhappy at the thought of Tuffy marrying Betsy. Solemnly she faced the fact that she was in love with him herself.

Now what? she thought dismally. Do I stand by and watch it happen? Do I resign or ask for a transfer? Do I try to get rid of her?

She thought about the situation for several days, keeping a close eye on both Betsy and Tuffy. Finally she concluded that he might very well be on the way to falling in love with Betsy. Obviously he had been quickly attracted to the girl, and equally obviously that attraction had continued and deepened into a sort of protective camaraderie on his part. Julie thought that if he had fallen in love he had perhaps not realized it yet. As for Betsy, Julie felt quite sure that she was the sort of girl who would fall deeply in love with any man who met her requirements. For her, Tuffy was no more to be preferred than any other man who could give her a home, love and babies. Julie did not think Betsy was actually dreaming of Tuffy when she talked of her future marriage, but if Tuffy should ask her to marry him, she would instantly center those dreams in him.

So far as Julie was concerned, in these few days she had admitted to herself that no man other than Tuffy would meet her requirements. The warm, deep voice; the long fingers curling about his pen; the sudden boyish grin and equally sudden rages—all were familiar and dear to her. Betsy could just wait for the next man to come along, Julie decided. She was not going to surrender Tuffy without a struggle. There was always the possibility that Tuffy knew quite well that he was in love with Betsy, and in that event Julie's interference would infuriate him, but that was a risk which must be faced. There was also the possibility that even if he did not love Betsy, he might equally not love Julie. She felt like Jane Bingley: that if she could have seen half as much affection for herself as he had show Betsy, she might have ordered her weddi gown.

In the end there remained two altern tives. Either she could get Tuffy to transf Betsy or she could get Betsy to ask for t transfer. Either seemed hopeless. She tri suggesting to Tuffy that Betsy was really line for a full secretaryship and it seemed pity to hold her down as an assistant.

Tuffy merely said, "Give her a raise. W can't lose her. She's worth her weight gold."

So it boiled down to getting Betsy to as for the transfer. Julie tentatively held o the bait of a full secretaryship to Bets mentioned pay increase and private offic but Betsy only widened her eyes.

"Oh, no," she protested in her soft litt kitten voice. "Really, I'd rather stay her Julie. I just love working for Mr. Ferrier.

"I JUST thought you might like more re sponsibility and someone easier to work for, said Julie helplessly. "Mr. Ferrier is prett difficult at times."

"He's always sweet to me," Betsy replie literally. "I know everyone calls him Tuffy but I don't see why. He's just as nice as ca be. I don't have to be transferred to anothe man, do I?"

"No, of course not," Julie said. "I jus thought you should know you were in line

And that was that. Tuffy went on beam ing and making litt jokes and practicall chucking Betsy unde the chin, and Bets went on saying "Oh Mr. Ferrier" an adoring him with he eyes, while Julie fel she could not stan it. How she longe for one of the gooc old Tuffy rages whic might make Bets reconsider her opin ion of his sweetness and light, but he was obstinately even-tempered, and beyond an occasional fit of impatience nothing marred the sweet serenity of the third floor of Temporary Building X.

Isn't he ever going to fly off the handle again? Julie wondered hopelessly. He can't keep this up. Just one good juicy furor—please, Tuffy!

Out of this prayer was born her stratagem. If Tuffy would not rampage unassisted, she would assist him. She selected the day of an important conference and telephoned Tuffy in the morning to say she had a splitting headache, feared she was catching cold and would Betsy carry on?

"You can't be sick," he protested aggrievedly when she had finally made him understand she would not be at the office that day. "What about the conference? What about Tilson's trip to Canada? What about the reports?"

"I can't help it," she replied firmly. "I wouldn't be any use if I came down. My head aches so badly I can't concentrate on anything. You'll have to make out with Betsy."

"She's never done conference work," he objected in annoyance. "Can't you take some aspirin and get well in time for the conference?"

For a moment Julie was so exasperated by his attitude that she very nearly abandoned the whole scheme. "I'd much rather you wouldn't count on it," she told him sweetly. "Betsy can take care of it, I'm sure."

There was a moment of silence. "Are you really sick, Julie?" he inquired in an altered tone. "Have you called a doctor? I think I'd better come out and see how you are."

"Oh, no," she cried hastily. "I'm not ill except for this headache. I'll take some aspirin and lie down. Betsy can handle

"My daughter and I... both of us raised on Clapp's!"

"25 years ago, when I was a baby," says Mrs. William Hesketh, of Rochester, N. Y., "my parents were neighbors of the Harold H. Clapps.

"So when Mr. Clapp started making the first baby foods, I was one of the first to eat them. And my family tells me I did wonderfully well on them, too!

"Now I have a daughter of my own . . .

"My daughter, Ann, is almost three years old. She was fed Clapp's from her first mouthful of solid food. And even though she weighed only 5 lbs. 1 oz. when she was born, she couldn't have turned out to be a healthier, sturdier baby!

"When she was 2 months old the doctor put her on Clapp's. And by the time she was 3 months she weighed 11 pounds 8 ounces! So even though I'd always heard how good Clapp's foods were, I couldn't help being thrilled at what they did for Ann!

"Now she's quite a grown-up little girl. She weighs almost 35 pounds. And lively? Why, she's got so much energy that half the time I just can't keep up with her!

"She's never been a 'fussy-eater.' All along, she's loved her Clapp's foods—and spinach is one of her favorites. We spent last summer in Florida, to be near her father's Army Post. And even when the thermometer was way over 100°, Ann never lost her appetite!

"Of course, I've always heard lots about Clapp's from my mother. And when I look at Ann, it's awfully easy to see why doctors recommend these baby foods so enthusiastically! It seems as if a baby just can't help but thrive on Clapp's!"

Why your baby will thrive on Clapp's!

- Ever since Clapp's originated baby foods 25 years ago, we've made all our foods to fill doctors' requirements.

- We've constantly improved our formulas, added new foods, according to doctors' suggestions. Now we offer "the world's largest baby menu."
- We make every test we can, because we want to.
- We discard many fruits and vegetables that would be perfectly acceptable for adults, but not, in our judgment, for Clapp-fed babies.

- All our foods are pressure-cooked—to help retain vitamins and minerals, fresh color and flavor.
- We have seen two generations of babies raised on Clapp's. Our business, we believe, is the most important business in the world. It is our sole business, not a sideline.

- Perhaps this is why so many doctors prescribe Clapp's regularly.

"Well," he said anxiously, "take care of yourself. Don't worry about us. We'll be all right."

The day was endless. Julie could not concentrate on her book, and after dropping three stitches in her knitting she gave it up and wandered aimlessly about the apartment. Thinking of the important conference, she restrained herself by main force from rushing straight down to Temporary Building X. The peremptory summons she had half hoped for did not come.

By afternoon she faced the fact that her plan had misfired. Obviously Betsy was more capable of soothing Tuffy's savage breast than she had supposed. With a sick misery inside her she dressed and went down to the office, where she went to Anne McConnell and asked for a transfer. The personnel manager was a little difficult to convince.

"You're not serious?" she wailed. "Oh, Julie, whatever has he done to you? I thought you really had him under control. It's been two years. Oh, dear! Where will I ever get anyone to stand him?"

"I'm perfectly serious," Julie assured her. "I'd like to be transferred immediately—today, if possible."

"Well, give me half an hour," Anne sighed. "I think I can work it out and I'll let you know before closing."

With considerable trepidation Julie left the personnel office and turned toward the third floor.

Sounds of upheaval greeted her as she came down the hall. With mixed emotions she opened the door to Mr. Ferrier's room. Within was pandemonium. An office boy was gathering up mail while a frightened page girl was sobbing under the impact of Tuffy's voice raised in anathema. Betsy was frantically rustling through papers at one side of his desk and both phones were ringing.

"Answer those blank phones," Tuffy was yelling hoarsely. "Close that blank door. Will you stop messing about my desk. You"—stabbing a finger at the snivelin page girl—"shake that sheep dog's hair-d out of your eyes and go find that visitor. You must remember where you put him."

Julie walked forward automatically an picked up the phones.

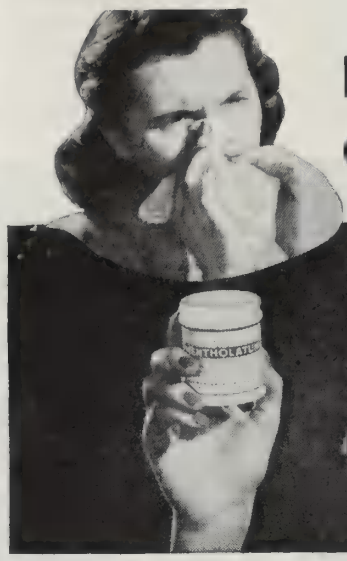
"Mr. Ferrier's office," she murmured rapidly. "He's engaged at the moment. I'l call you when he's free."

Tuffy stared at her open-mouthed. "Julie," he said brokenly. "Thank heaven you're here. Get rid of these morons. Do something. I'm going mad."

Swiftly she dispatched the mail boy and the page girl. "What is going on?" she asked curiously.

He looked at her helplessly. "They've mislaid Mr. Prather," he said bitterly. "That fool girl thinks she remembers admitting him to the building, but she can't remember what she did with him. He never reached the conference. We waited nearly an hour."

Betsy knocked a pile of papers off the desk with a soft thud. He jumped as if he had been shot and glared at her. "I can't find that report from the Bureau of Mines," she quavered.



"Never mind," he said icily. "The conference was finished an hour ago."

Her lips quivered as she stooped and retrieved the papers. Gathering them into an untidy heap in her arms, she dropped the mass on his desk, knocking over the ash tray in her haste.

"Julie," he said violently, "get that incompetent child out of here. She was intended to run errands for you, not to do your work."

Betsy stared at him with hurt eyes. Her breath caught on a sob and she whirled and ran out of the room. Julie went after her. Betsy was crying quietly at her desk.

"Oh, Julie," she gulped, "it was terrible! Everything I did was wrong. I couldn't find

When Betsy had gone, she started clearing the office. As she moved about, sorting d straightening, Tuffy watched her through e door of his office.

Peace descended upon him. Now everying was all right—Julie was back. He andoned himself to the welcome silence, s eyes unconsciously approving the lithe ovements of her slim body. He closed s eyes and relaxed in his chair.

What on earth would he ever do without Julie? he thought affectionately. Never was there anyone who fitted him so well. Her sense of humor, her quiet efficiency, her quick-witted handling of the thousand annoying details that came to harass his days—every man he knew envied him Julie. And pretty, too, he reflected, seeing in his mind's eye the soft blond hair and deep hazel eyes, the graceful neck and arms. Leaning back in his chair and thinking of Julie, an idea entered his mind and revolved slowly in delicate arabesques. An incredible idea, incredibly perfect. With a spring, he arose and went to the door.

"Julie," he said with an insinuating grin.

"Yes, Mr. Ferrier?" she answered.

"Do you really call me 'Tuffy'?" he inquired.

She closed a file drawer and blushed faintly, looking up at him. "Yes," she admitted valiantly.

"Am I really that bad?" he asked sadly.

"The term is not strong enough," she observed blandly. "You're rude and impatient and violent and you scare little girls into hysterics."

"But you still love me a little?" he insisted pathetically.

Something in his eyes made Julie retreat a step—to find herself blocked by two long arms.

"I suppose so," she said feebly. "The way a mother loves a problem child."

With Tuffy's lips on hers, Julie heard the familiar tap-tap of Anne McConnell's footsteps in the corridor.

The transfer, she thought with a chuckle. You're too late, Sister Anne. I took care of it myself.

O. O. McIntyre once asked in his column who could tell, without looking it up, the present tense of the verb of which "wrought" is the past participle. At first I thought it so easy that I passed it by, but somewhere in the back of my head a mischievous little voice said: "All right—what is it?" From that day on I have been muttering to myself. I'll be darned if I'll look it up, and it looks now as if I'll be incarcerated before I get it.

Asthma is a handicap no baby should fight alone. Wise mothers must learn how to cope with allergies, administer latest relieving drugs.

Asthmatic Invalids are Old-Fashioned

BY DR. HERMAN N. BUNDESEN

President, Chicago Board of Health

A CHILD'S choking, panicky efforts to exhale air during an attack of asthma always wring a mother's heart. And yet, if she has watched asthma develop untreated, as many do, in the hope that the child may outgrow it; if she has failed to find out how the acute seizures may be relieved; or if she has not helped the doctor search relentlessly for the cause—the child's suffering, in large part, may be her own fault. For the most severely afflicted child can be greatly improved by modern methods, and many can be completely restored to health. All can be spared the failures and humiliations which mar the life of the youngster with unrelieved asthma—the old-fashioned asthmatic invalid.

Asthma is characterized by recurring attacks of painfully labored breathing, with wheezing, coughing, excessive mucus and a feeling of constriction or tightness in the chest. These symptoms are caused by repeated spasms contracting the bronchial tubes—air passages in the lungs. Chiefly, breathing difficulty comes when the sufferer is exhaling; he can get air in, but then the passages tighten or close and he can't get rid of it, except at the expense of gasping effort. An attack of asthma may last only a few minutes, or it may drag on for several days, unless specific measures are taken to relieve it.

In general, there are three main causes of asthma. It may come on as a result of infection in the tonsils, teeth or elsewhere in the body; in this case the original infection must be found and treated to relieve the bronchial inflammation. Sometimes asthma occurs as a nervous manifestation, with asthmatic seizures closely following emotional upset or nervous stimulation. Finally, it may be a reaction of the body's tissues to some substance, such as a plant pollen or animal emanation, which is inhaled in the air or otherwise encountered in the environment. This last type, allergic asthma, is by far the most frequent. Often the true source is a combination of allergy and nervous or emotional upset, and both causes must be sought out and dealt with in successful treatment.

Doctors today are agreed that allergie are not inherited, but that the tendency to b allergic is inherited. Thus, when mother ha migraine and father is a hay-fever sufferer for example, the child is almost certain t have some kind of allergic reaction. In earl infancy, this is most likely to be eczema, bu as the child grows older the chances are tha hay fever and, later, asthma will develop unless steps are taken to prevent it. Unfor tunately, far from outgrowing allergies children usually suffer symptoms that be come progressively more severe. (In a com paratively few cases of boys whose asthma i

Ask your Doctor!

associated with glandular development, the disease tends to disappear at puberty. Sometimes asthma comes on quickly, but in most cases it is preceded by other allergic reactions and thus can be prevented from developing.

The child whose asthmatic attacks follow exposure to a dust or pollen that is inhaled or a food that is eaten is lucky. By careful detective work, mother and doctor can find the offending substance, and in most cases it can be largely removed from the environment. When this is done, improvement is often sudden and dramatic. Children who have suffered for years, or whose growth has been retarded by the failure to breathe properly, may quickly develop into normal, healthy, active youngsters. Progress in school and better social adjustment often come with miraculous speed.

Not so fortunate are the children who are allergic to so many things that it is impossible to free them completely, and those whose reaction develops as a result of sensitivity to such unavoidable conditions as heat or cold, and effort or exercise. These are the children on whom the disease is hardest. They cannot swim or play ball or run. Heat and cold are constant hazards. In many of these children, the reaction is aggravated by nervousness or emotional upset. Crying, especially, is likely to clog the air passages and set off an attack. Consequently, mother must make a constant effort to keep the child's life calm and harmonious. Other interests must be substituted for the forbidden activities, so that the child's social and emotional development will be as nearly as possible like that of his classmates. Especially during an attack, mother must use every device to divert the child's attention. Often, when a seizure is imminent, mother may succeed in getting the child to concentrate on a book or toy or game. Then the tense, hard muscles controlling the bronchial tubes will relax, and the spasm will pass quickly or fail to develop.

To understand that the sky is everywhere blue, we need not go round the world.

—GOETHE.

But when, in spite of every effort to remove the cause, asthmatic attacks continue to occur, mother must be prepared to relieve them. Whenever possible, the doctor should be called, as his measures will bring relief most promptly. However, in the life of every child who suffers from persistent, severe asthma, there are many occasions when it is impossible for the doctor to come quickly enough. Mother must be ready for these crises. She must know what drugs are needed and how to administer them to relax the bronchial passages so normal breathing will replace the child's terrified gasps for air.

Some doctors still prefer the use of inhalants—steams or vapors that the child can breathe in to clear the passages of mucus and relax the squeezed airways. For comparatively mild attacks, barbiturate drugs, taken by mouth, often bring sufficient relief; these are sedatives which relax the whole body. During severe seizures, however, it is sometimes necessary to give drugs with a more potent relaxing action. Epinephrine and ephedrine are the ones most commonly used, and these may be best when injected with a hypodermic needle—a procedure which mothers of children with intractable asthma may learn under the doctor's careful instructions and use only as he directs. Many children also get "desensitization" treatments to diminish the number and severity of their attacks, so that eventually drugs are no longer needed for relief.

Recently, doctors have experimented successfully with drugs which can be introduced into the rectum, and with an inhalant whose principal ingredient is the new drug, penicillin. Until these are developed further, however, mothers must depend on measures already available to liberate the child from the invalidism that has been the needless burden of so many asthmatics.

LOVE IS THAT WAY

remembered her day, and the final moment on her knees before the oven, changing the spoon bread to a higher rack, when she had looked up to see the baby perched on the railing of her pen like a tightrope walker, teetering. Katie had reached her in time, with no harm to either baby or bread, but with a pain slashing across her back and a deep burn on her wrist.

She said, her voice muffled beneath her curved arm, "It seemed my part was over when I had put the dinner on the table. It always is, these nights." The tears came then, in a rush, as she remembered all the evenings he had bent, preoccupied and silent, over his desk, not welcoming interruptions. Oh, it would take all he could say, all he could do, to atone for this final unfairness—all the strength of his arms, the deep notes of his voice, his kisses on her tears, his remorseful, passionate words to stir the tide of feeling in her and wash away the hurt.

He said, "Katie, what's got into you? You surely know I didn't mean any conceivable rebuff. You know you'd hush me at such a time and never dream I'd take offense."

Her mind said, He's right. It's true. But still she did not speak.

He went on quickly, "And it's got to be that way between us, don't you see?" His voice was harsh with urgency. "We can't be having to watch each other for storm signals all the time. Life's too short; there's too much else to do. We've got to be able to count on one person to understand we're never hostile, whatever we may say or do. Otherwise things will be just too—hard."

The words and the tone scared her suddenly. She remembered what he had been through while he was away. She knew what he was going through now, trying to get the Courier back on its feet after nearly two years of suspended publication, since the week the baby was born and she had given up trying to get it out alone. In two years the Monmouth people had learned to take the city daily, and it was hard to shake them loose from habits. It was hard and slow, getting them back, and harder and slower to get the advertising when the circulation was down. For six months he had struggled, inching back, operating at a deficit that was taking the last few hundred of their savings. These were his crucial weeks, the time he needed all the help a good marriage could give a man.

AND theirs was a good marriage; they had proved that in the two years before he went away. Starting with little more than the ideals they had brought from college, they had bought and built up the paper, meeting impossible obstacles and conquering every one by the magic effectiveness of two minds and bodies functioning as one.

And now he was warning her that she was making it hard for him.

She said in a small, stifled voice, "You're right. Of course. I don't know what got into me."

He patted her hand briefly. "I'll tell them you had a headache, shall I?"

"My goodness, not that one." She tried to laugh. "Tell them I have to get the baby's bed ready." Of course the baby's bed was ready. Katie spent her day doing everything, absolutely everything, exactly right. And doing it over, and over, and over.

But he was saying, "Good. I'll bring Beth up if she's sleepy." And that was all.

He was going downstairs; she heard the three voices murmuring and rumbling pleasantly below, with Beth's chortle high above them. The danger was over; they had not quarreled. She saw things clear and straight: wives did their jobs and did not act like babies crying for attention. What if Madame Curie had started to cut up like this in the last stretches of an experiment?

Rise, Katie told herself firmly. Go down there and shine.

For a moment, even then, she could not move. Her body was heavy with a tight, miserable, unsatisfied ache. But that was just tiredness. She was always tired from noon on, these days.

She pushed herself up at last and went to her dressing table. She brushed her light hair into a soft, smooth fall about her shoulders, cooled her hot face with witch hazel, painted deeper crimson over her childlike curving lips. No one would dream she had been crying; she looked fresher, younger than ever, her cheeks glowing with color and her blue eyes liquid-bright like Beth's. With her two fingers she poked the corners of her lips up into a silly, rueful little smile. Then she stood up, fluffed out her pinafore and started down the stairs.

Ben's mother and father stayed late, in their leisurely social fashion. Only a few hours afterward the sound of screaming began to beat at Katie's consciousness, through layers of blanket into which she burrowed, through the rebellion of her whole being. It was intolerable to be torn from sleep. But the shrieking went on, appallingly shrill, insistent, ripping through her warm drowsiness like pain. She lifted her head and forced open her smarting eyes; the clock said ten to six.

She stood up, her body heavy and aching, shivering in the gray chill, groping for her robe, feeling blindly for her slippers. She heard Ben stir, heard his luxurious sigh, and saw him spread his arms and legs in voluptuous comfort over the space that she had occupied a moment before. She drew a deep, resentful breath and turned away.

As her feet shuffled down the hall, the crying ceased. The baby was ready for her with a smile of lavish generosity, allowing her the privilege of serving her. And so it was a privilege, Katie thought with a rush of love, gathering her up. Her weight sent a stab of pain through Katie's back as she carried her to the bathroom. Sitting down on the stool, Katie stripped off the wet clothes, tossed them into the white enamel bucket. It sent out a sanitary smell. There would be a big wash today, but it would never dry. The windows were gray with fog.

Downstairs, her back still pained as she stood stirring hot milk into the baby's cereal. Beth began again to yell in fury that anyone should deliberately display food before her when she was starving. Katie set the porringer on the high-chair tray and placed the stubby spoon in the clutching pink fist. Then she watched, fascinated, as the baby swiftly and silently put where it would do the most good a mixture which to any normal palate tasted like sawdust.

THE time of waiting in the gray chill crept by. This proved to be one of Beth's days to revolt against imprisonment. If Katie but carried her toward her pen she clamped her strong little legs around Katie's waist and tangled her fingers tight in Katie's hair, screaming. Katie sat down with her on the sofa and tried to read a novel she had started one night a week before. Beth seized the pages in ruthless moist fingers. Katie picked up a magazine and showed Beth the pictures. Beth was interested, but only while Katie kept her mind strictly on her commentary. Should Katie's eyes stray for an instant to the fiction alongside, Beth expressed outrage at the lapse. Social life she regarded as her right, for which she would fight with voice, tooth and fist. Much as Katie loved her she felt unequal to the demand for companionship before breakfast. It required undue effort to explain why the ladies in the ads grinned so widely or looked so disconsolate. She watched the grandfather clock's indefatigable pendulum and yawned, rubbing her swollen eyes. Her head ached heavily. At last she heard Ben move upstairs. She dropped the baby abruptly in the pen, turned on heat beneath the percolator, got out eggs and thrust two slices of bread in the toaster ready to turn on. She was squeezing oranges when Beth's yells reached their crescendo.

"What you been doing, beating your child?" Ben asked above her ear.

She jumped, surrounded by the baby's and the motor's noise, almost faint with startled shock. She looked up into his grinning face, fresh-shaved and rested. She felt her own cheeks heat with anger.

"I'm trying to get your breakfast," she said stiffly.

"But is it good to let her stand and scream?" he asked. "Won't it make her hate her pen just that much worse?"

"No doubt," Katie said and turned the motor up to higher speed. Her hand, pressing the orange violently against the reamer, slipped off the wet slick skin against the swiftly whirling ridges. She cried out, cradling her fiercely paining right hand in her left, tears of hurt and anger burning her eyes. The baby screamed louder than ever.

Ben shut off the motor and looked at her uneasily.

"I DIDN'T want you to have to wait for your juice. And I didn't want it to l-lose its v-vitamins." Her upper lip humiliated her by stiffening, quivering uncontrollably.

He picked up the baby and the noise stopped. Into the sudden silence he said pleasantly, "A Children's Bureau release came in the other day. It said they've found out orange juice can stand indefinitely without losing vitamin C."

She looked up at him there before her, his hair dark and crisp and coppery against the baby's red-gold silky curls. His gray eyes were clear, and his thin, bold-featured face wore a look of intellectual interest as he gave her this information. A flood of angry heat washed over her shoulders; her chest ached with tension that was tightening unbearably. She almost hated him.

He set the baby beside him on the bench of the breakfast nook. Katie glanced over sharply, her lips forming cautionary words, but the baby cuddled back comfortably into the corner, chewing on a crust of bread that Ben had given her. Katie felt vaguely snubbed, as if Beth had allied herself with Ben against her.

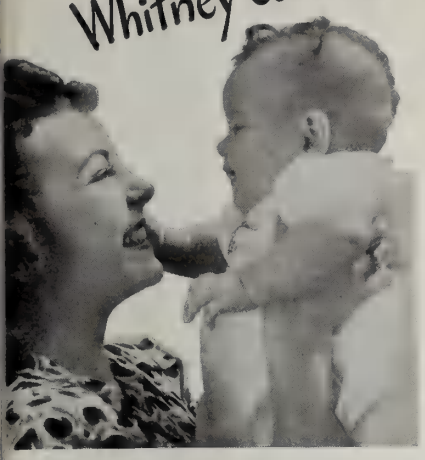
Ben went to the living room for the paper and Katie leaped to stand guard by the baby. But Beth kept on chewing her crust, unmoving, almost smug in her new virtue, openly repudiating Katie's vigilance. Ben came back and sat down to sip his orange juice, studying the paper. Katie put the eggs on and started the toast and poured the coffee.

"Did you see anything in here that would make a good editorial?" Ben asked.

She smelled the toast and made a dive to turn it before she answered. The toaster was within an inch of Ben's elbow. She said coldly, "I didn't have a chance to read the paper." Actually she had not unfolded it. She almost never did more than glance at the headlines these days.

She sat down opposite Ben. He was pushing aside the silver bowl of cosmos to make room for his paper which he propped up in its special rack at his right. Then he started eating his cereal cheerfully, glancing up between spoonfuls at the paper. Behind it the baby was very quiet, letting him read in comfort, not even snatching away the paper, though it screened her from the room. Again Katie felt absurdly that the baby was unfair to her.

She stirred the sugar into her coffee, clicking her spoon against the cup. "I've waited two hours for this moment," she said.



He looked up in surprise. "Didn't you have any coffee?"

She shook her head. She had asked sympathy of him and received criticism. But it was reasonable. Why hadn't she had coffee? She didn't quite know. It would have saved her two hours of headache. And yet she had stubbornly, miserably waited. Why? Was it because breakfast with him had been her loveliest daydream when he was gone? To give up and make her coffee in loneliness would be somehow admitting that the dream

Why Mummy and I chose a Whitney carriage

"We talked about baby carriages.
Just the two of us. Mummy wanted one that would be easy to handle.
I wanted comfort. So-o-o, we compromised.
At least we both got what we wanted and in one carriage. And it's good-looking, too! Of course, it is a
Whitney. Whitney's Steer-O-Matic
Wheels* turn corners automatically.
No tilting, no shoving for Mummy.
No jouncing up, then down, for me.
The Steer-O-Matic Wheels glide around corners with just finger-tip guidance.
And me? Well, I think the extra spring length of Whitney's Center-Suspension
Springs* is pretty wonderful.
This extra length absorbs vibration before it reaches the carriage, so I have an amazingly jar-free ride over any pavement.
Mummy is thrilled with the Concealed Folding Gear. My Whitney folding carriage is as streamlined as a coach. No ugly gear frame to break its smart lines or catch on Mummy's clothes. No wonder we both are proud and happy every time we go out with our Whitney Carriage."

You, too, will be delighted with the easy handling, extra baby comfort and smart styling of a Whitney Carriage.

was gone, that nothing could ever be again the way it was before he went away. In the silence of the kitchen her thoughts went back with nostalgic longing to those leisurely, loving breakfasts of other days.

Gradually, against her will, she felt the tug of mother instinct, warning her that the silence behind the paper held an insidious quality. Only slowly her ears became alert to hear a sound so slight as to be almost inaudible—a faint, delicate, rhythmic tap upon the floor.

She came fully alive to the present and jumped up. She pushed the paper rudely aside from before Ben's absorbed gaze and saw the baby sipping with relish from the bowl of cosmos. She drank from one scallop of the fluted rim, and from two others poured little streams of murky water upon her person. From her neck down she was thoroughly drenched, surplus water dripped steadily from her garments to the floor.

Katie jerked the bowl from Beth's hands, but the baby herself she could not reach. "Will you please pick her up for me?" she asked in a furiously formal tone that checked his smile.

"It's not poison, I guess," he said inadequately, giving the baby to Katie's outthrust arms.

Katie took Beth in silence. He had not even apologized. The baby had been right beside him all the time, where he had placed her, in his plain view, but hidden from Katie by his paper. And he had been ready to enjoy it as a joke and turn the consequences over to her.

Trying to keep from contact with the baby's dripping clothes, Katie marched with Beth to the bathroom. There was quite a business there, removing of overalls and sweater and undershirt and pants and shoes and socks. The water in the vase had been none too fresh, Katie realized with distaste. She would have to add all these clothes to the laundry. And today nothing would dry.

In the midst of it all she heard Ben's voice. "Katie?" It was his helpless, absent-minded tone that always irritated her even before she learned what he wanted. She did not answer. "Where's the cream?"

Her teeth came together. Where would the cream be? Wiping the baby's skin with decisive dabs that brought squeals, she shook her hair back, calling, "In the refrigerator, of course, if it's not on the table."

After a moment he called, "I can't seem to find it." His voice had the tentative, dependent quality it took on at such times. Not only did he fail to take care of the baby, but he expected her to take care of him too.

"You'll just have to wait, then," she told him with a certain satisfaction.

Five minutes later she brought the baby back clean and sweet and solid in her fresh clothes, put her in the high chair and turned to the refrigerator. But the cream was not there. Katie pushed the crowded food around and still she did not find it. Mystified, she took out a milk bottle, set it on the counter and reached to the shelf for the pitcher. As she snatched it down, cream splashed over her wrist. She stood still, remembering. She had been filling the pitcher when she stopped to rescue the toast.

She set the pitcher on the table and bent to wipe her splashed shoe. Ben poured in his cream, drank his coffee and stood up. He had waited too long to have his second cup. And because he did not look cross about it she felt obscurely angry. That made no sense at all, and she knew it. She followed him to the door, suddenly dreading the emptiness his going would leave behind, needing desperately to draw him back across the barrier between their two worlds.

She said, "Look." The mountains were wreathed in soft white veils of fog. "I don't know what Beth will do for clothes if this weather keeps up."

He had turned to look, too, at the blue mountains. After a moment he quoted softly, "'Season of mists and mellow fruitfulness ——'"

She could not speak. His words were a masculine outrage. She wondered wildly if Keats had wandered off to write his Ode to Autumn leaving a wife to try to dry her washing in the fog. She held her mouth closed firmly to keep back the words. He looked down at her. His lips and hands moved slightly, very slightly, and then he turned away. He said good-by over his shoulder while he walked swiftly to the garage.

She knew why he had not kissed her. That was easy. She was anything but kissable, standing there glowering with all her unsaid thoughts. That was the worst thing a man could do to a woman: force her to be unalluring, and then be unallured.

She walked back into the empty, dark living room, her body tense with a deep unsatisfied ache. Something physical was winding up, tightening, tightening inside her, an awful need for an explosion, violent, to give release.

Her mind knew better than to think that quarrels cleared the air; she knew they only hurt relationships between grown-up, sensitive people like Ben, hurt them irrevocably. The words that crowded in her for utterance would do real damage to Ben when he had taken all the damage he could stand.

But the other part of her, the deeper part, did not listen, paid no attention to argument. It wanted a quarrel, it demanded it, and it would have it in the end. This unbearable tightening, tightening tension inside her had to have relief.

The phone rang and she ran to it in fright, partly from habit built up when Ben was forever in danger, partly from superstitious dread of some disaster her thoughts had brought upon him.

"I'm in a jam down here," Ben said, speaking hastily against the clatter of the linotype machine. "Elsa's sick, left me high and dry with only half the personals I need. Think you could get down here and help me in about ten minutes?"

"But the baby ——"

"Mother'll take her. I phoned. We can drop her off there on our way down."

"But your mother can't do the washing."

"You said it wouldn't dry anyway." His voice was impatient. "And I reckon mother can find something to put on her if she runs out of gear."

His tone tossed away all her important concerns as nothing. She gave in with reluctance. "Well ——"

She was nervous as they drove away from his mother's, worrying about the baby and about the job ahead. She had not given a thought to the practical details of running the paper for nearly two years.

THE phone was ringing when they went in. Artie, the linotyper, was nowhere to be seen. Ben answered and beckoned to her. "Stop-press news from Round Pond," he told her.

Dazedly, her mind still half on the baby, thinking she must call soon and find out how she was faring, Katie started taking down Miss Ellie's items. Hieroglyphs of shorthand appeared as if by magic on the paper beneath her hand. Her old habits were coming back to her.

As Miss Ellie started to hang up, Katie said, "Wait. Let me read that last one back: 'Mrs. Vernon Rodemayer has just returned from visiting in Van Vliet with her daughter and son-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Skudlark. She was brought home in an ambulance Tuesday to her farm on Round Pond Road and will be in bed from six to eight weeks, according to her physician, Dr. Justus K. O'Brien, depending on how fast she recuperates.'" She glanced over to see if Ben had heard. He was behind the linotype, gasping with exertion.

"My gracious!" Miss Ellie squealed. "I clean forgot to say she broke her hip."

"What was that date?" Katie asked, taking data and marveling at her efficiency after these long months. As she put down the phone, it rang again. She picked it up, stirred by a sense of lively contact with the goings on of the world.

Mrs. Laidlaw gave her an easy item for the women's page about the Parent-Teachers' meeting. Katie's self-consciousness was gone now as she checked the spelling of the out-of-town speaker's name and asked sociably:

"Well, was it a good turnout?"

"A good turnout! Katie, listen. If you had heard the way Mr. Hodges got us adjourned when someone started to ask about the new first-grade teacher. You know she's Councilman Farrell's niece ——"

Katie listened and interposed questions. When she hung up she turned to meet Ben's quizzical face. "This is no women's-page story. I guarantee to cause a large circulation of this week's paper if you don't mind making a ripple in county politics."

He grinned. "I've got a column aching for it on the front page. Only be careful."

"I'll get Bessie Carmichael to bring over the secretarial report so we can play it safe." She picked up the phone, scribbling out a headline, "Three per cent Attendance at Parent-Teachers' Meeting," and a subhead, "Superintendent Hodges states teacher qualifications no concern of parents."

When she had Bessie's promise she went over to the linotype where Ben still struggled. She touched the keys, wondering at the warmth the fantastic old relic could still stir in her. Like a Rube Goldberg contraption, a conglomeration of gadgets projecting in all directions, emitting clacks and groans and sputterings of lead when persuaded to operate, the machine was as incredible to her now as on the ecstatic day they had acquired it, and roused in her the same deep devotion. The prospect of composing her story on it gave her a thrill she had forgotten.

"Imagine thinking straight into lead type for posterity," she said now, as she had said that first day.

"I never knew thoughts could have so many typographical errors," Ben had answered that other time, grinning. But no subscriber had minded the mistakes, except once when she referred to Mrs. Jacqueline Hartfelt's son as her sin.

This time, though, Ben did not smile. He was working with a monkey wrench, breathing hard. "Better get on with your leg work," he grunted.

She turned away abruptly to her desk, picked up her notebook and marched out. If he thought she was only a bumbling homebody substituting for a professional, she would show him. She would bring back enough personals to make him wish Elsa Nicholson might become a chronic invalid.

Her first stop was the Blue and White Market, to ask Mr. Marvell about his new grandson. The baby had been born at Grimley Hospital, an ideal circumstance, because each trip of relative or friend from Monmouth to Grimley was good for an item. And every name mentioned in the paper, Ben figured, was worth on the average five dollars in yearly income.

When she had Mr. Marvell warmed by her interest in his family, she told him of a recipe for a one-dish meal. "Your customers would love you for it," she added softly. "It would make a marvelous ad."

His shrewd old eyes twinkled. "Mind you get it into four dollars' worth of space."

Her voice sang as she told him good-by. Four dollars wasn't much, but four dollars here and four dollars there added up.

The drugstore gave her a still better haul of personals, and a bigger ad. Her feet were light on the sidewalk as she went on, visiting each store and office on the main street. The windows showed her figure trim as ever in the suit she had bought long before the baby came. She felt suddenly very unlike a housewife. She was a person out in the world doing a job with notable success.

HER failure came suddenly, without warning. The theater manager, new since her time, gave her a queer malevolent look with his surly refusal of an ad.

"Then we'll publish the time schedule of your films for free," she told him with a gay smile that always brought her one in return.

It didn't, this time. Incomprehensibly, he would not tell her the time the pictures went on. She walked away from him startled and confused. Some fishy business lay behind this, she knew. It was important to find out what it was, for people wanted just such information as the movie schedule in their paper. Perhaps the city paper was keeping its Monmouth circulation this way, by paying for the premiums, the sets of dishes and the bingo prizes offered by the Bijou instead of decent films. She made a note to suggest Ben run a campaign for better motion pictures.

She had kept Miss Lottie Phippen, the dressmaker, for the last. She was a gold mine, though her items required sharp censorship. Miss Lottie greeted her warmly. "It's been a month of Sundays, honey, since I've seen you." She swept a tangle of cut goods and paper patterns from the bed which occupied most of the tiny room above the hardware store. "I've been hoping you'd be by today, ever since this morning when Elsa stopped in to get the yardage for Corinne's wedding dress."

"Elsa!" Katie sank to the bed, staring at Miss Lottie. "Do you mean Elsa Nicholson?"

"Certainly, Elsa Nicholson." Miss Lottie bit off a thread. "Know any other Elsa around here with a sister Corinne? Though why she lets the little snip drape herself in ivory brocade at four-ninety-five a yard for a scamp——"

"Elsa," Katie asked faintly. "Elsa—isn't ill?"

"Ill?" Miss Lottie was taking pins from a pattern and putting them in her mouth. "She was walking mighty spry for any ailment I ever heard tell of. Had to run, too, very likely, to catch the eight-forty to Grimley."

"To Grimley?"

"Sure, your own husband sent her, didn't he?" Miss Lottie took off her pince-nez, leaving red marks in the bridge of her nose. "Look here, now. Don't tell me that Elsa was playing possum——"

"Oh, no!" Katie opened her notebook, talking fast. "I remember, it was ink for some posters we're doing in the job-printing department." Before Miss Lottie could ask what the posters were for, she went on rapidly, "What was the date, now, of Corinne's wedding?" Miss Lottie must not start wondering, for she never wondered silently. "You say she's wearing white chiffon?"

"Ivory brocade," Miss Lottie corrected her kindly. "I guess you're a little rusty in your reporting, aren't you, honey? I don't wonder, it's been a coon's age since you did any."

But it would be longer, Katie thought, before she did any more. Ben had tricked her. He had not needed her at all. In his omnipotent wisdom he had decided that she needed a day at the office as therapy to cure her temper tantrums. It was the most humiliating insult he could have figured out.

She stepped into the office, hot and breathless, her brain seething with neat, searing phrases to accompany her departure. She flung her notebook on the desk, jerked open the drawer and seized her purse. Ben was operating the linotype, his face bent oblivious over his copy. The phone rang.

She stood with her hand in the drawer grasping her purse. The phone rang again. Habit was too strong. She could not resist the sound. A phone call might mean anything from quintuplets to murder. She answered.

"You let me speak to your boss!" a furious voice shouted in her ear.

"Why, Colonel Willett!" She put delight into her voice. He had been a challenge to her charm ever since the days when she had climbed to his knees, ignoring the menace of his beetling white brows. "Have you got some good news for us, colonel?"

The clacking of the linotype had stopped.

"Good news!" the colonel's voice rasped. Then in grudging deference to amenities he asked testily, "Why aren't you minding your young one where you belong?"

"Beth's with her granny, colonel," Katie told him sweetly. "My husband claimed he needed me today." She hoped Ben noticed the wording.

But the colonel was shouting, "He'll need more than your help if he goes on the way he's going." There was genuine fury in his voice. "Trying to stir up strife in his own community——"

"Colonel, that's the last thing I'd expect of my husband," Katie told him.

"I'd have said the same a week ago," he growled. "I read that story when it came out and I thought it was mighty fine. Said so, in fact, and told the cashier he could go ahead and sign up for a quarter page of bank advertising every week. And I never heard till today the truth about that so-called hero. Of all the deceitful, underhanded——"

She had reached for last week's paper as she listened, flipped to the third page where Ben published each week the history of a local boy in the war. Reading the headline, "Mess Boy on the Carrier Rapidan," she realized that she had hardly glanced at the Courier lately. She skimmed through the account of the mess attendant who had left his bombed-out galley to take the place of a dead pharmacist's mate and save the lives of twenty men before he gave his own.

"But it's true," she told Colonel Willett. "Ben told me about it when he came home."

"I don't care how true it is!" the colonel's voice crackled against her ear. "That isn't the point. The point is that your husband was trying to make fools out of his readers. And if he thinks the respectable merchants of this community will support a paper with an editor who deliberately tries to put over propaganda by deceit, telling a story like this with a straight face, calling that Larkin boy's folks 'Mr. and Mrs.'——"

She understood then. When he paused, she said softly, "Colonel Willett, do you know what I think? I think Ben didn't even think about it. In the war, knowing these boys and what they did, he got so it just didn't seem very important to him what color they were. You see, colonel, one of the lives that Granville Larkin saved was Ben's."

There was a thick silence for a second. Then she heard the colonel's voice, smothered-sounding. "You sure he wasn't trying to make a fool out of—anyone?"

"Yes, I am," she told him. "And now he's home, doesn't he deserve a chance to forget what he's been through? Don't we owe him every break while he gets his breath and settles down?"

"Well——"

Before he could get back his angry eloquence, Katie asked, "Aunt Beulah's arthritis is better this year, isn't it? I saw some wonderful chrysanthemums in your garden yesterday——"

Ben was stage-whispering from the linotype. "Cut the old buzzard off."

Didn't Ben realize what she had done? She did not cut the colonel off until she had his promise that she could come around and get the first quarter page of his series.

"I know you invited me down for my health," she would say when she came back with the ad. "But while I was here I thought I'd stay long enough to get you out of the red." That would be a valedictory snapper. But first she must get the contract in black and white.

Tact is the ability to give a person a shot in the arm without letting him feel the needle. —LADY LESTER KEFFER.

She had it when she came back. But Bessie Carmichael was there, waiting with her notes of the Parent-Teachers' meeting. Katie left the contract on the desk and took Bessie to the typewriter. Ben came to the desk while she was typing. He whistled. Over Bessie Carmichael's head he made the V sign to her, his gray eyes shining. She smiled back, before she thought, feeling the old thrill of a job well done together. Then she remembered the scene in Miss Lottie's room. But she would not spoil this moment for Ben. His face was quite pale with relief. He must have been sickeningly worried, she realized suddenly, during those long nights he had bent over his desk at home.

She wrote the Parent-Teachers' story, and when it was finished Ben had gone to the station for a batch of paper that had just come in. Artie had taken a few too many drinks while waiting for the linotype to be repaired, and now he lay asleep on the print-shop floor. She would have to see Ben through the day.

"Six hundred!" she shouted exultantly when she had finished the personals. "Six hundred names!"

"Great." Ben looked up from the composing stone. "But look, I've got a hole in the Family Life Department."

She came to stand beside him. "I could plagiarize an article from one of those Children's Bureau releases."

He handed her one. She looked at it, her lips tightening, and walked silently to her typewriter. She wrote the headline, "Orange Juice Holds Vitamins Indefinitely," and the subhead, "New discovery lets harried housewives squeeze juice ahead." Then she looked up. Ben was watching her in concern. A smudge of printer's ink extended one quirked eyebrow into a comic extreme of alarm. In spite of herself, her lips quivered, and she laughed. He grinned and went back to the linotype.

At ten that night they were still working. At twelve her whole body was one fierce ache of weariness. But the press was rolling, and she was stacking up papers. They would be ready when the boys came with their wagons early in the morning. Strangely, by one o'clock she did not feel tired any more. And there was something very wonderful about the last moment, just as it used to be, when Ben was locking up.

They went out to the car and she waited while he put the top down. It was a clear night; she had never seen so many stars. She could almost see each one in the Milky Way. She laid her head back on the seat and looked up at them as Ben drove through the dark deserted streets of the little town.

"Ben."

He looked at her, and even in the dim light she could see one eyebrow cocked up in wariness as he waited. He had guessed that she knew—it was hard to keep a secret in a town this size—and he was worried.

She said, "You learned a lot of different things in the service, didn't you?"

His voice was cautious. "Well?"

She went on, "Remember when you were training down in Florida? You wrote me once about what you were doing that day at the field. About how the men were busy securing loose gear, putting planes in hangars, tying everything down, making everything fast, because a hurricane was coming."

He nodded, not speaking, and the car slowed a little.

"But if it came too near, remember, if it looked as if it would be too bad, you said it didn't do any good to batten things down. You said when you were sure, you all just hopped into your planes and flew them off to Little Rock, Arkansas. Remember?"

If you have a poor memory you can cure yourself by lending small sums to your friends.

—COL. W. C. HUNTER: Brass Tacks (Copyright, 1938, Reilly & Lee Co., Chicago).

"I remember," he said, the car going very slow.

"What did you call that field in Arkansas where you flew your planes to? Out of the storm?" she asked in a curious little voice. "That was what I wanted to remember."

"We called it our flyaway base."

"I see." She nodded. "That's it." He didn't speak, and after a moment she said, "Ben, it's all right. It's over now. The storm, I mean. The glass is up again, the air is clear. It's safe, now, to go home."

For a few seconds he did not answer. Then he said, "There's something I must tell you first, Katie."

"What?" she whispered, sitting very still, suddenly afraid. "What, Ben?"

He said, looking straight ahead, "The washing dried."

"Ben!" She did not know which was coming first, her laughter or her crying.

"Mother got Minnie to wash. The baby slept at her nap, woke up cheerful, ate a good supper and is sleeping now," he finished in a rush, still staring ahead.

"Ben!" She was laughing now, and crying too. "How do you know all that?" She looked at him in wonderful, unbelieving excitement.

"It's my business to know," he told her gruffly. "It's my baby, too, isn't it, that wears all those things? It's my job, isn't it, to keep track of what goes on in our own home?"

She looked at him a moment, before her arms went up to pull his face against hers before they kissed, tasting each other's tears salty on their lips, their faces wet and warm together. "Let's fly home now," she told him. "Honey, let's fly."

He started the car up then, and it came as near to flying as any little car of its age ever did, on those narrow winding hills, under the starlight, to their home.

A MAN TELLS US WHAT WE MUST DO

than the large. Their nerves are nearer the surface and, in youth at least, they are likely to suffer from a physical inferiority complex. Caesar was a small man. So was Napoleon. So were Mussolini and Hitler. Billy the Kid was slightly formed; his hands and wrists were so flexible that he could slip them out of almost any handcuffs made.

Perhaps the best answer to the whole question is contained in Theodore Roosevelt's autobiography. That extremely courageous and outspoken man, who in his twenties, and with a Harvard accent, pushed his way into several gun-toting communities, gave as his recipe for a long life the following: Minding your own business. Soft answers. Avoidance as much as possible of centers of disturbance, such as gambling hells, and so on, and a reluctance to give offense; the last also meaning a desire to understand the other fellow's point of view, however insane it may seem in the beginning. Theodore Roosevelt lived to become President of the United States. Many of the most successful sheriffs of the Old West, including a famous one in Nevada who was a cripple and weighed only a hundred pounds, never carried a gun. They thought carrying one was dangerous and provocative. Instead, they "talked people out of it." Cold nerve, plus a soothing voice, has an uncanny effect upon even the most ferocious of animals, and so, of course, upon man, the most ferocious of all. There is not the slightest doubt that all through the ages—however rough—tolerance, reason, honesty, vision and good humor have been the best of life insurances. Intelligent idealism has always been a synonym for practical success.

One hundred and ten years after Mr. Colt's twenty-first birthday the world was equalized again, and in the same dramatic, lethal, final and uncomfortable fashion, but on a much larger scale. By the atomic bomb all nations, big or small, have been cut down to about the same size, and death once more has shown its complete impartiality. It is quite possible to imagine an enraged Switzerland destroying the rest of mankind. There's no argument. It's here. And so there's not a bit of sense in planning for the future until the future of this latest result of man's restless inventiveness has been discovered. We have at long last eaten of the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge, and we'll take the consequences, whether we like them or not.

There's no use running a business, there's no use operating a farm, there's no use writing a book, there's no use editing a paper, there's no use even in getting married and having children, until, first and foremost, we, and the rest of mankind, come together in good faith to present a common front against universal and adventitious death. Over and above all else you do, that is the thought you should wake up to, go to sleep with and carry with you all day. Moreover, time passes.

Christian, Mohammedan, Jew, Negro or white, Russian or Frenchman, American or Englishman, Arab and South Sea Islander, Protestant and Catholic, Democrat and Republican, forget, each man and woman of you, every lie and prejudice, or even just complaint, you have heard or harbored. The slate is wiped clean until the paramount matter is settled. Naked and defenseless man stands beneath the instant menace of the skies, his one defense his will and his courage, his one hope the brotherhood of man. Make no excuse, anyone, that he is busy or unimportant. Or remote. Or that one of many millions, he exercises little power or control. That's not the way a democracy is run. The opinions of individuals make the opinions of communities. The opinions of the communities make the opinions of the counties. The opinions of the counties make the opinions of the states. The opinions of the states make the opinion of the Federal Government. And man can change his world, almost overnight. It's been done repeatedly. Christ changed it;

Buddha changed it; even Washington and Jefferson and Benjamin Franklin.

Man can do just about what his courage and his vision dictate.

And with that we can get back to Mr. Colt. It was Mr. Colt who put final authority to the statement "the bigger you are, the harder you fall."

We are now the greatest and most powerful nation in existence. Even Russia is by no means so powerful yet or so great. But at the very moment we reached the apex of our power, it was snatched away from us by our own inventiveness, as has been shown. The responsibility and influence, however, remain. Furthermore, we've done something else to put us thoroughly on the spot. One hundred and seventy years ago we took an oath and put it down on paper. We made a promise and signed a contract; with ourselves, with the entire world. We said we believed in freedom, equality and justice. What are we going to do about that? A man who breaks his word is a liar. And liars are not popular. We should not have made a promise unless we meant to keep it.

But we did mean to keep it—most of us.

A SCIENTIST TELLS US WHAT WE MAY EXPECT

Never mind the military man who talks as if this were merely a more powerful hand grenade, or the advertisements of costume jewelry made of the pretty glass stuff left behind in the desert after the experimental bomb was exploded. Instead here is a summary of the situation by Dr. A. H. Compton, former chairman of the Department of Physics of the University of Chicago, now Chancellor of Washington University, St. Louis, a sanguine realist most intimately concerned with developing the bomb. Much of what he says has been said fragmentarily elsewhere; some startling aspects are left out; but few have drawn the basic picture more clearly. The result explains why a scientist friend of mine said that, for the first time, it was scientists, not the public, who were sounding sensational about a new scientific development. Came the revolution, with no advance publicity, when they tried out that bomb at Alamogordo.

From here on, quotes mean Doctor Compton talking. He starts on an apparently reassuring note:

"World government," he says, "is now inevitable." On closer inspection, though admittedly essential, "world government" proves to be not necessarily comforting. There is the awkward question "whether this government will be one agreed on by the peoples of this world, or whether the great nations will elect to fight a third war that will settle who is master. In world unity by agreement lies greater life. In the unity forced by another war"—meaning a world conquered by some opportunistic atom-armed power, hoping thenceforth to stay on top of the heap by monopolizing atom bombs—"lies death to millions and disaster to all mankind."

Sloppy professional word slingers have worn all the sharp corners off words like "millions" and "disaster." They mean this:

Suppose two major powers, ourselves being one, use the next ten to twenty-five years to develop war use of the atom bomb. One power decides it is time to let fly. Because of the enormous advantage of surprise, Pearl Harbor tactics will be employed. "Jet-propelled planes or rockets with atomic war heads will be sent without warning at each of several hundred of the enemy's major production centers." That is, New York, Los Angeles, Detroit, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, each with its name instantaneously changed to Hiroshima. If your town has over 100,000 people, it is probably on lists already being prepared by foresighted military men. Bombs will be far more powerful than those used on Japan, which utilized only a thousandth part of the energy theoretically available in the charge. Other experts, taking into careful account what kind of terrain it lies on, what it is built of, and so forth, will have lovingly engineered them and their method of delivery to annihilate your town and its people most effectively.

"At least ten per cent of the attacked nation's population will be wiped out in the initial blow." If the attacked nation's launching sites have been properly hidden and dispersed, its experts can immediately start giving the attacker a dose of his own cataclysmic medicine. He will retaliate with a second carefully prepared attack. Within a few hours or days "we should expect about one out of every four of us to be killed. If our nation should eventually win, what would we have gained? Perhaps the control of the world. But of what value would this be with our civilization gone?"

Thus would appear the war-born kind of world government—an atom-bolstered imperium over a world consisting, as Bertrand Russell recently wrote, of "septic rubble."

Now and again somebody gets into the papers with an airy statement about how new weapons always produce new defenses, and the same ingenuity that made atom bombs will make effective countermeasures. You do not hear such talk from the scientists whose cleverness is thus blithely relied on.

"Those concerned with the development of the atomic bomb"—meaning most of the more brilliant physicists of the English-speaking world—"have not seen any feasible means of preventing the bombs from striking their targets. . . . It would be a mistake to suppose that it is the atomic bomb alone which has revolutionized warfare. For the first time in history it became impossible during this war to protect one's home by holding the enemy beyond a wall or a fighting line. This change was brought about by armadas of airplanes guided by radar, jet-propelled planes traveling at the speed of sound, and long-range rocket bombs. What the atom bomb added was merely a more efficient means of destroying a target. One plane could now do the work that had required a thousand."

Some few of a flock of such planes or rockets will necessarily get through any defense. If they are used on any considerable scale, one out of ten would be far too many. A possibility that Doctor Compton omits, but which many experts consider dismally real, is that of smuggling atom bombs into a potential enemy's key cities during peacetime to be set off at a prearranged signal, Trojan-horse style. If a hundred such are discovered beforehand, and only one slips by ——

"Only two countermeasures have been so far proposed. The first is to disperse our cities, preferably into hilly regions, so that more bombs will be required to destroy them. The second is to place all military installations and essential industries underground, and provide emergency underground shelters for the whole population. . . . We cannot expect them actually to be put into effect until a real threat of war is felt. Then it may be too late." Recent unofficial estimates show that such a program would cost round $250,000,000,000—125 times what it cost to develop the atom bomb.

Doctor Compton is quite as crisp as any other authority about the dead horse issue of the "secret" of the bomb:

"We have secrets, yes. Plenty of them. It has cost us great effort and expense to learn them. I see no reason for giving the secrets away without something of corresponding value in return. But it would be a tragic error to suppose that, by keeping this 'know-how' to ourselves, we can appreciably delay the progress of a determined rival in producing atomic bombs. . . . Making allowance for normal delays to make tests and improvements as the work progresses, we may consider perhaps 1955 as the date from which, if no agreements to the contrary are previously reached, we will be living in a world armed with atomic weapons. . . . Both cereals rich in added iron - needed by most young babies

Babies are born with a supply of iron built up during the prenatal period. This supply often runs down three, or more, months after birth. So baby must get his iron from what he eats.

That's why Gerber nutritionists have added generous amounts of precious iron to Gerber's Cereal Food and Gerber's Strained Oatmeal. Both contain added Vitamin $B_1$—a further help to baby's well-being.

Serve both cereals turnabout, for variety helps baby eat better. Both are pre-cooked—simply add milk or formula, hot or cold. Be sure to get Gerber's Cereals—with "America's Best-Known Baby" on every package!

reason is against letting such a race get started. When all are armed, no superiority of one nation will make it free from great damage by the other. One man may own a .22 target pistol and another a high-power hunting rifle, but neither is insurance against murder by the other. The insurance is to take away both guns, or the fear of punishment by the police, or, most surely of all, the development of a social conscience for which murder becomes unthinkable."

Only ten years in which so thoroughly to re-educate mankind's emotions that war "becomes unthinkable."

Doctor Compton conservatively neglects the possibility, which nevertheless exists theoretically, that intensive use of atom bombs in a future war might set off "chain reactions" so vigorous that the whole surface of the earth would be destroyed, like an orange seared in a blowtorch. That, however, is the least of Junior's potential worries. Whether the atom bomb that he encounters produces a self-limiting explosion, covering a mere county or so and killing only half a million people, or goes on inadvertently to annihilate the world, he will never know what hit him anyway. This "chain reaction" possibility is mentioned here only because nothing else makes it so clear that, after dogged search, mankind has finally found the key to ultimate—if insane—destruction.

If, having read this far, you can ever again look at your children with the same untroubled conscience with which you gave them birth, you might as well stop reading and do your best to forget it all as an irresponsible Sunday-supplement nightmare. Some can forget. Your neighbor's pup is equally fortunate in not knowing what will happen to him shortly after the atom rockets take off. Or he may escape altogether, since dogs' lives are short. Human beings, like yourself and Junior, live longer.

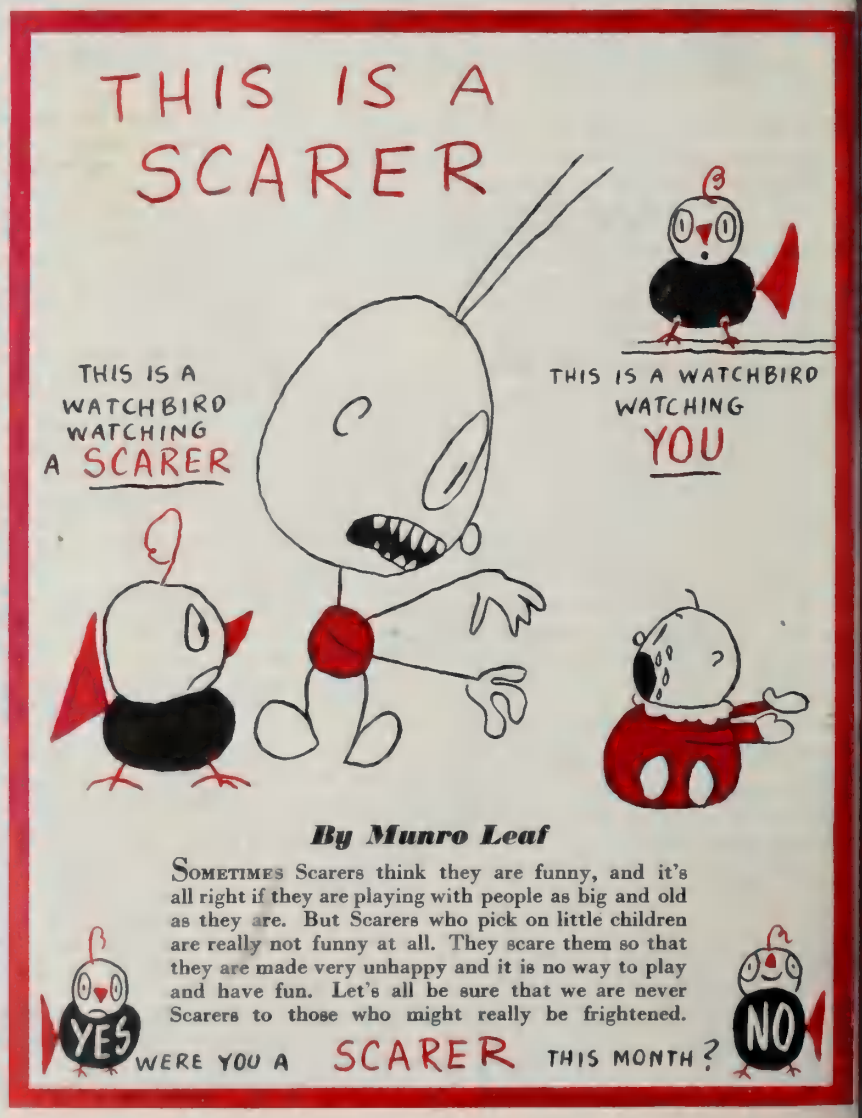
A civilization-shattering use of atomic energy in war will be doubly tragic. For thus to employ it to destroy us will rob our children of a civilization, based on atomic energy, far higher and kindlier than any we have yet known. President James Bryant Conant, of Harvard University, a noted scientist whose voice carries weight in such matters, has said that discovering how to tap atomic energy is a technical landmark as important in human history as the discovery of fire. Sober scientists do not make such extreme statements without ample reason. It follows that a future war using atom bombs would be as fantastically criminal as if the discoverer of fire had used it to burn up every living thing, himself included.

Doctor Compton, like his colleagues, can see only a little way into peaceful exploitation of atomic energy, but that little necessarily implies tremendous richness beyond the limit of vision. "Fifty years ago it was obvious that X rays were useful for 'seeing' through objects opaque to ordinary light, such as the human body. It could not be predicted that X rays would become a powerful weapon in the fight against cancer or that researches made possible by X rays would reveal the electron and with it give us the radio and a host of electronic devices. Such unforeseen developments are the result of every great discovery of science."

One obvious and hugely important possibility for atomic energy is already evident in the fact that "the fission energy available from a pound of uranium is equivalent to over a thousand tons of coal"—that is, 2,000,000 pounds. Modern man uses coal primarily as a source of heat to be transferred into power. Already "controlled atomic power in the form of heat is in continuous production in large quantities at several plants, especially those at Oak Ridge, Tennessee, and at Hanford, Washington." So far it is only a by-product, carried away uselessly by air or water. "We have not yet built an atomic power plant that is generating electric power. If there were sufficient reason for a demonstration, a reasonably efficient plant using superheated steam could be put into operation within a year."

Thus applied, atom power can help solve a problem that has troubled engineers for years—how to avoid wastefully burning up dwindling supplies of coal and oil for power when both are far more useful as sources of raw chemicals. "The introduction of such a new source of power is clear gain. If it will lessen the cost of heat and power in our cities, it will be a stimulus to every industry. If it reduces the pall of winter smoke, it will be a boon to us all. If it gives cheap power where industry and agriculture need it but cannot now get it, it will extend our economic frontiers."

Atom-powered cars or planes are not likely. To shield human beings from the destructive rays given off when atomic energy is released requires metal shields so thick that the lightest imaginable atomic-energy unit will probably have to weigh over fifty tons, twenty times the weight of the average car. But such power supplied by large units to turn the wheels of industries and railroads is very near indeed, feasible, Doctor Compton thinks, within ten years of development along lines already clear.



That is only the most obvious way in which, if given the chance, atom power can lighten and enrich man's life. "We also see important though limited medical and industrial applications of radioactive materials artificially produced by atomic chain reactions. Perhaps more significant . . . are the new vistas that will be opened up by scientific experiments that make use of the by-products of atomic fission. . . . It is noteworthy, however, that along with other technical advances, the effect of atomic power is to force human society into new patterns." Doctor Compton mentions that it implies widespread integration and co-operation of great areas and great numbers of people; educating skills and leadership into more people; and far higher standards of the individual's relation to the common good. He is not just rolling big words over on an unctuous tongue—those social facts follow as self-evident from constructive use of atomic energy. "If we will let ourselves grow as thus indicated, the civilization of the atomic age promises to be the richest that history ha known, not only with regard to materia bounty, but also in its cultivation and appre ciation of the truest human values."

For practical safety, Doctor Compton ha two suggestions:

"If we are wise, we shall take immediat steps to form this world government by in ternational agreement instead of waitin for a third world war of unparalleled de structiveness to determine the ruler of th world. Until this world government is estab lished, the United States should limit its de fense preparations to ability to reply to an attack that may be made against us wit such strength as to devastate our enemy's im portant surface installations. This is a defens objective which we can achieve without seri ously straining our national resources."

That is courageous talk, highly creditabl to Doctor Compton as both citizen an scientist. Nevertheless, arriving at a worl government strong and responsible enoug to be trusted with the atom bomb implies "new pattern" with a royal vengeance—diametric shift of the emotional habits c leaders and average individuals away fror violence and suspicion toward internationa good faith. The man who says that, thoug this shift might be accomplished in a thou sand years, it is flatly impossible within th ten years available, is not just a spiteful pes simist—that is what common sense tells hir against his desires. Yet, to keep civilizatio from being either erased or brutalized to a eternity, the miracle must be pulled off.

Such a task does not allow of either "secre minded" senators or human ostriches amor their constituents. Your sense of emergenc must immediately turn so acute that a pre ponderant number of men and women ar spurred into making a personal habit of th impossible. There is no precedent for such mass revulsion from usual ways of feeling But neither are there precedents for atomi energy or the emergency it has produced The unblinking fact is that here is the de cisive test whether human beings really ar capable of civilization.

"PLEASE Use Side Entrance" is the sign tacked firmly on the front door of the ground-floor apartment in the high-built two-family house at 189-33 43rd Road, Queens. The sign has been there eleven months. Nobody knows how much longer it must stay.

Any visitor permitted to enter at the side door and wind his way through the apartment to Andrew Breidenbach's cheerful, sunny room, round which the household affectionately centers, would know right away that the little boy is not just in bed with a cold. His handsome, triangular little face is pale with the paleness of the long-term shut-in, and the room—once the family living room—has an unmistakable quality of permanent adaptation to a sick youngster's needs. Everything is within tactful, easy reach—the sturdy, adjustable bedside table, the special board for the P-40 model plane he is working on, the big radio, the tank of goldfish who are solemnly introduced as Sharkey, Felix, Cleo, the Deacon and Salty.

For its own inscrutable reasons fate has singled out the Andrew W. Breidenbachs for the dramatic revolution of family life that comes with total illness. Nine-year-old Andrew, with his huge brown eyes, quaint grin and a personality full of eagerness and ginger in spite of everything, is the crux of that revolution. Sometimes his mother thinks back musingly to the way Andrew, Jr., missed his luck when he was born with a caul so close-fitting over his tiny head that the doctor had to destroy it to save his life—a preserved caul is good luck, but what about one thrown away? Anyway, at eighteen months the new baby had a terrible case of whooping cough, followed by a heavy pneumonia that may well actually have been a preliminary bout with his current illness. Then came chronic ear inflammations and a tough tonsillectomy; then scarlet fever at five, and a broken arm at six. Any childhood disease brought home by sister Audree, three years older than Andrew, struck him harder, and frequently with complications. The climax came in April two years ago, when, after a series of mysteriously tough colds, the family doctor tried the patch test for tuberculosis as an off-chance precaution—and it came up positive. Immediate X rays showed a lung cavity as big as a golf ball.

Tuberculosis, as all experts on the disease point out, is "a way of life." When the case is cared for at home, the way of life includes the whole family. And even then, as the same experts would tell you, home care is not ideal. In theory—and in practice, with proper facilities—a good sanatorium best supplies the complete bed rest, smooth and reassuring routine and upbuilding diet that usually contribute the most to the rescue of victims of tuberculosis. But in small Andrew's case such facilities were lacking. His folks tried their best to find them, putting him in a large and well-known tuberculosis sanatorium close enough to home to make frequent trips possible. But the more they saw of the place, the more worried they became. Only two nurses to twenty kids—help so short that the older youngsters, Andrew included, had to help the younger ones take showers and to assist in serving meals—and too many other details failing to jibe with the information the Breidenbachs had as to what such patients needed. Several attempts to carry out the recommended "pneumothorax" treatment—collapsing the ailing lung for rest by internal pressure—failed because Andrew's chest wall was not adapted to it.

Within two months Pauline Breidenbach's mind was grimly made up. She took her boy out of the place, over the protests of sanatorium doctors. At the time she was extremely disturbed, but by now she has calmed down to where she can say well, maybe it was partly war shortage of help that made things that way. Through her husband's connections with the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, for whom he has worked ten years as collector-salesman, the family got the name of a crack New York woman doctor specializing in children—she approved their decision when she heard the story—and determined, with her as supervisor, to set up their own sanatorium for "the little fellow." That is the way the Breidenbachs usually refer to young Andrew, with an indescribable softening of the voice. When TB moved in on him, he was just moving from the cowboy-and-Jap-fighting stage into the begin-to-toss-a-football-around stage.

This is the point where the lightning really struck. The Breidenbachs had previously been a hard-working, church-going, sociable family, as normal as the advertising calendar on their kitchen wall. Now, except for the hard work, everything has changed. Pauline had to call every relative and friend and say "Don't come round until further notice"; they were all very nice about it, but it was hard to do. They shifted the little fellow's bed from the room he had shared with his parents to the living room, which became a private hospital room, chosen because it has the most light and, once the front door is barred, the greatest seclusion of any of the apartment's five rooms. In parallel, all family routine was shuffled to center round the patient's needs for rest, quiet, emotional peace as far as possible, and nourishing food; no more occasional movies for Pauline, who used to count on them as relaxation from housekeeping; no more butter at meals when butter was so short, because the little fellow needed all that could be got; no more vacations in the mountains, because the little fellow couldn't be moved and, thanks to expensiveness of illness, money was short anyway. However devoted, many a father and mother would have been incapable of the self-discipline and intelligent rigidity that such a program demands—which is one of the principal reasons why home care for TB is not generally encouraged. But Andy—to distinguish senior from junior—and Pauline are of special stuff, thoroughly up to absolute consistency in the duties that are winning their boy's battle for him. The doctor nods her head in admiration and says all the testimony she needs as to how well they are doing lies in the thundering improvements in young Andrew's X-ray plates.

At first Andrew had to have almost flat-on-the-back bed rest, permitted to prop up on a one-way pillow only for meals and occasional games. No mother needs to be told what psychological difficulties that entails. But Pauline has done well here too. Every minute of his day was planned. Before the rest of the family were stirring, he was bathed and "dressed"—his mother figured that the morale-building effect of changing rumpled pajama tops for a freshly ironed shirt "to give him the feeling he was really getting up and going to bed" was worth much more than the extra effort it cost. Then, when Audree was off on her thirteen-block walk to school, and daddy was off on his rounds in the family '39 Chevvy, mother would appear with Andrew's breakfast and the leisure to chat with him while he ate.

True, dishes were stacked in the sink longer than German-descended Pauline, née Jungbluth, could have contemplated in normal circumstances, but normal these were not, and she kept housework reduced to bare minimum at queer hours in order to leave plenty of time for reading aloud Andrew's favorite sea stories and participating in endless jigsaw puzzles. Indispensable catching up would be done during the little fellow's rest period from one to three, still inviolate, with everybody warned not to ring the doorbell for any reason whatsoever.

Later on, perhaps during Andrew's early supper, Audree would take him in the afternoon paper with the latest comics and retail the latest goings on at school or Girl Scouts. Tall and blond, with the troubling shyness of adolescence beginning, Audree not only looks like her fair-haired mother but seems also to have inherited her gentle tact. It is a pleasure to watch her gossiping, smiling, tinkering along with him at his bedside without the slightest tinge of impatience or do-goodness; yet she is conscious enough of the kind of handling he needs carefully to point out, when discussing the uses of the family's movie projector, that the Mickey Mouse shorts shown on the little fellow's sickroom wall "are every bit as good as what you see at the movie houses."

Andy, being breadwinner, never gets all the time he would like at his son's bedside. To a full day of sales talks and premium collecting, which has made him an expert on the involved geography of all Queensboro, he usually has to add a full evening of the same most nights, catching people who work daytimes or husbands whose wives he has sold on the idea of insurance. Only on week ends can he count on taking a hand in innocent games of family stud poker—carefully kept at an unemotional level, with the little fellow catching on fast—or take his turn at reading aloud and also supply the (Continued on Page 200)

R: Periodic checkups for entire family. TB is contagious!

Tuberculosis rewrites the lives of all the Breidenbachs—as it must when any family chooses for sound, emergency reasons to hospitalize patient at home rather than at sanatorium. Isolation is rigid rule for home care. A room of his own—light, well ventilated, but not kept at Aleutian frigidity—means Andrew has better chance of resting, healing injured lung. According to best current medical knowledge, rest is 80 per cent of TB cure. For mother and father, run down by worry and work, and for adolescent sister—at susceptible age—isolation lessens danger from virulent germs.

Queensboro, like thousands of American communities, is geared to help family put up intelligent fight. Board-of-health visiting nurse suggests ways and means of making isolation more effective, stresses need for separate dishes for youngster—usually distinctive color or design—makes certain each member of family goes for checkup at regular intervals. Queensboro TB Association provides X rays at $1, teaches public that every good health measure is anti-TB measure.

How to Handle the Bedridden Child

By Milton I. Levine, M. D.

THERE are thousands of boys and girls throughout the world who, like Andrew, cannot run and jump and play. Instead of enjoying the normal activities of a normal childhood, these children must stay at home—many confined to bed. With rest and care, many will someday be able to go out into the world and take their part in everyday life.

The nature of the child's recovery, the manner in which he begins again to participate in his child's world, perhaps the entire course of his adult life, may be deeply affected by the first weeks of his infirmity. The attitude of his parents is of the greatest importance during this period. Under normal conditions it is no easy task to establish a sense of security and self-confidence in a child. Infirmity, chronic illness, physical handicap, whether temporary or permanent, multiply the parents' problems. An intelligent program, an awareness of the importance of emotional security, will go a long way to counteract the misfortune of infirmity.

Robert and Jerry were two boys I knew who came from fairly similar home environments. They were both well-adjusted boys. The misguided handling of Robert resulted in a difficult personality problem. The intelligent handling of Jerry minimized greatly the tendencies toward emotional maladjustment.

Robert's illness and his absence from the normal activities of a nine-year-old boy were of a comparatively short duration, a period of no more than six weeks. Yet in that six weeks the personality of the boy, his attitudes both at home and at school underwent a completely radical change.

Robert was a popular boy at school. He was helpful, inventive, self-reliant. He participated in all the games, excelled in some, and was always ready to lend a helping hand when it was needed. When he developed a cold, he accepted it as any normal child accepts a cold. It was a nuisance, keeping him at home when he preferred to be out playing with the other children, and nothing more. But Robert was an only child and his mother and father were easily alarmed. When his temperature rose, he was put to bed, wisely enough, and the doctor was called. But when Robert's condition was diagnosed as pneumonia, both the mother and the father went to pieces, asking hysterically:

"Is it serious, doctor?" . . . "Will we have to send him to the hospital?" . . . "Shall we call in a lung specialist?"

Such immediate reaction to the initial shock of serious illness is understandable. Robert contracted his pneumonia before the discovery of sulpha drugs, and the alarm of the parents was not unusual. It is quite the normal thing to ask your child's physician whether the child's condition is serious and needs more consideration than you are giving it. What is wrong, and utterly inexcusable, is the putting of such alarmist questions to the doctor in the presence of the child. And this is what occurred in Robert's home.

You can well imagine that the boy was extremely upset by the obvious agitation of his parents. His mother kept taking his temperature on the hour, and visibly indicated her anxieties as the fever began to climb. Both mother and father, and even grandma, hovered constantly over his bed. They constantly asked him how he felt, how was his throat and was he warm enough. Robert was undergoing a treatment that would undermine the confidence of a person considerably older and more mature.

And then, a week later, the pneumonia was complicated by empyema—a collection of pus in the chest. His parents became completely frantic, moaning and weeping again in front of the child, utterly unaware of the effect on the boy.

Robert spent some three weeks in the hospital where he gradually recovered from his illness. In the meantime his doctor had had a talk with his parents, and as a result there was a noticeable improvement in their attitude. As the boy's condition cleared, there were toys to play with and books to read, and both mother and father honestly attempted an air of optimism and cheerfulness. However, the initial damage to Robert's confidence and security could not be so easily overcome. When Robert got home, whatever doubts had been sown by his parents' earlier anxieties were more deeply rooted by the further well-meaning but ill-advised handling of his convalescence.

Unquestionably Robert needed special care when he got home. He also needed to renew his contact with his social world. Of all this his parents were aware. Again they were well-meaning, but again their overanxiety led to completely incorrect and even harmful procedure. There was a ceremony of taking his temperature three times a day. Medicines became a ritual. There was an alkaline tablet first thing in the morning, to alkalinize his system. A tonic to stimulate his appetite was taken three times a day. There was a teaspoon of iron tonic after each meal and, before bed, a sun-lamp treatment and a tablespoon of cod-liver oil and malt.

It is scarcely to be wondered at that when Robert got back to school, he discovered himself a rather helpless sort of boy, isolated from his classmates by a series of fears and taboos. He arrived at school wrapped up in enough sweaters for half a dozen children; he was not allowed to go outdoors if the weather was the least bit inclement; he was not allowed to play games in which he might become the least bit overheated. And his classmates were all apprised of these special precautions. Robert would have to go a long way to fight out of this insecurity, this lack of confidence which his parents had built.

Robert is not a happy boy. He resents his isolation. He does not like all the special care and attention he gets, but he is afraid to tear himself away from it. He needs it now. It is the only social attention he receives, except when he throws a spitball in class or steals a classmate's pen or pencil. He has become difficult and unmanageable at home. This is the logical behavior to which the well-intentioned but misguided treatment by his parents has led him.

Jerry, our other case history, suffered a much more serious illness. The effects of his illness were more physically damaging. But Jerry was fortunate in that his parents were able immediately to comprehend the situation, overcome quickly the immediate effects of the initial shock, and intelligently meet the unfortunate situation.

Jerry was stricken with infantile paralysis. He was a normal ten-year-old boy, bright, active and popular with all his playmates. Imagine, then, the overwhelming shock which came to his parents when the doctor announced that their boy had contracted poliomyelitis, that he would be bedridden for a matter of months, that he might be permanently crippled. The fright associated with the very name of the disease, the element of the unknown, the possible terrible consequences—distress and anxiety enough to unbalance a family, disrupt a household. Unlike Robert's parents, however, there was no display of disturbing emotion in front of the boy. Jerry was reassured. He would get better. The doctor was taking good care of him. Everything would turn out well.

Alone, his mother and father talked over the situation. They told Jerry's younger brother, Richard, who was eight, that Jerry would get better. They told the grandparents that there was to be no weeping. The life of the child was to go on as completely normally as possible. There was to be no oversolicitude, nor was there to be any affected cheerfulness. Jerry was to be treated like a boy who was temporarily ill. There was to be no outward sign or manifestation which would in the least attack the boy's understanding of his relationship to his family and friends.

This was a good beginning. It was followed by an equally good, well-thought-out, concrete and constructive program. As soon as Jerry was well enough, there was a teacher who came to visit with him every school day of the week. Jerry was to keep up with his studies. As soon as it was possible, Jerry's friends were asked to visit, and the visits were gay and thoroughly enjoyable, with games and ice cream and cookies for Jerry's friends to remember. There was a letter which came from Jerry's former classmates at the public school, and this was the signal for the beginning of a broad correspondence, aided and abetted by his parents. Children were talked to before they came or wrote, and the generally healthy and optimistic atmosphere maintained and developed.

Dad did not neglect his part in the general program. He brought home new and interesting books, new and exciting games. He did his share of playing with Jerry and saw to it that Jerry won more games than he lost. Hobbies were encouraged. Jerry became an expert stamp collector and president of the boys' stamp club. There was a harmonica his father brought him, and a book of instructions. Jerry, who had always been musical, learned quickly and the house was livelier for the tunes he played and for the drum on which Richard accompanied him.

His brother Richard, of course, was not to be neglected, and his parents were aware of it. Jerry's games were balanced with other kinds of games for Richard, just as the drum came along with the harmonica. The brotherly relationship had to be fostered, harmoniously, and the drum-and-harmonica combination was an excellent and exemplary handling of the situation.

When Jerry's parents were finally informed that their son was never to walk again as other children walk, they both realized that their work with Jerry had only begun. Misfortune, however, did not distort their understanding. They recognized that all they had done for the boy had been good. Jerry would not walk again as they had seen him walk, but his spirit was good. He had lost little contact with his normal social world, and what he had lost had been considerably compensated for by other and intelligent activities. The problem now was to extend their program to meet with the life he was to lead, once he left his bed.

There was the airplane game father had brought, the models he had helped him build. This would now be supplemented with other, more intricate and more advanced studies in airplane construction and design. Jerry would be the airplane expert among his friends, respected and admired for his knowledge. He would be bought a better harmonica, and his parents would encourage him to become expert at it to win the admiration of his friends and to build up his own self-esteem. Here was a life that would not be distorted or crippled by unfortunate physical accident.

JERRY'S parents recognized that it is not enough simply to entertain a chronically ill child; nor is it enough merely to keep him busy and to see to it that he keeps up with his school studies. A real, understanding campaign was planned for the exceedingly necessary fulfillment of the child's emotional needs. His family and friends were brought into the program which might be outlined as follows, a program which may be readily expanded and adapted according to individual needs and situations.

Cultivate the child's former interests. Encourage him (and help if necessary) to master something not previously mastered.

Arouse and stimulate him to new interests. Work along with him to success. Father can do much to help in this.

As soon as possible, arrange to have frequent visits from his friends. Other contacts with friends may be made by means of letters and telephone calls.

Hobbies should be encouraged. Parents can help to maintain interest by spending time with the child and discussing the various aspects of the hobby with him, getting books, magazines, pictures. Here again the father can play a large part.

Plan things that will satisfy the child's ego. When he plays games see that he wins often enough, and praise him when he exhibits skill and improvement. Help him to become proficient at some skill, particularly one that will be admired by his contemporaries. Suggestions: harmonica, or some other musical instrument; painting, drawing, cartooning; writing poetry, prose; cultivating voice if any singing ability is shown; sewing, embroidering, knitting, crocheting; sculpturing, wood carving. Some things which the child makes can actually be sold.

Have the child's room cheerful, and give him an active part in helping to decorate it. He can collect pictures to put up, or make his own; take care of plants and flowers; take care of birds or fish; make things, such as curtains, hanging shelves, clay bowls and figurines.

NATURALLY the child's program and accomplishments are dependent upon his physical limitations. A child who can be up and about has many more activities to choose from than one who has to stay in bed. Some children may not have free use of their hands and arms. Others may have to lie prone. In any case, the parents must use ingenuity and imagination, bearing always in mind the emotional needs of the youngster.

Don't marry a girl because she looks sensible, because a sensible girl has more sense than to look sensible.
—THE RECORDER.

In the case of the older child, actual prevocational training should be considered. There are numerous commercial fields open to people who are in some way physically handicapped; many occupations, even, which can be pursued at home. Some children may be exceptionally gifted musically or artistically, and if their physical condition permits should receive special training in these fields toward a professional career. Others may want to go into some phase of the industrial arts such as dress designing, textile designing, advertising art, illustrating, jewelry making. For children with a scientific aptitude there are such vocations as bacteriologist, laboratory technician, research worker.

There are many other vocational opportunities for the physically handicapped, but before actual training is begun it must be ascertained whether or not the child is physically capable of following a career in the chosen field.

Once the child is up and around and out among people again, there seems to be an almost universal inclination to overprotect him. Parents should guard especially against this tendency, both in themselves and in others. One such youngster, on returning to school, was found, months afterward, being waited on hand and foot by his classmates, and the solicitude of his companions was preventing him from regaining his self-confidence. Independence and self-sufficiency should be encouraged, not thwarted, when the child resumes normal living.

All mothers and fathers wish their children to be emotionally secure, well-balanced, well-adjusted individuals. In the case of the chronically ill or handicapped child, when the circumstances are particularly difficult, the task of attaining this ideal will of necessity be more trying and complex. But the problems confronting parents in the care of their bedridden child are by no means insurmountable. Proper and sensible handling—with equal attention to the mental, physical and emotional aspects—will lessen the burdens of both parents and child, and go a long way toward insuring for the youngster ■ happy, satisfying, gratifying future.

BY JUDY BARRY

TO almost every woman, unless she lives alone and likes it, comes sometime the need for pleasant, capable bedside manners. Even if the illness she's called upon to care for is nothing more than a common cold or just weary bones, the kindly art of keeping a sick-in-bed person comfortable, while disrupting the rest of the household as little as possible, is an excellent thing in a woman. When you're ill, you know how wonderful it is to relax and feel that someone is taking over capably.

Chief among Mrs. Breidenbach's many fine qualities as Andy's special nurse, it seems to us, is the fact that she doesn't "poor sick boy" her naturally happy-dispositioned son, or make him feel that his illness worries and wearies her. He's a sensitive child, charmingly well-mannered, so that fretting over him or upsetting the family's routine for him would surely disturb his peace of mind—and that's more necessary to getting well than even good food or good care.

DOCTOR'S ORDERS

The first rule for a home visited by illness is that one member of the family, and one alone, should be completely in charge of the patient. It will probably be mother or grandmother, but this doesn't mean that she must be in the sickroom every minute, or that teen-age sister shouldn't help. It does mean, however, that she should plan for the patient's care, see the doctor and be responsible for carrying out his orders. Too many people milling about and attempting to help, no matter how kindly their intentions, can be very trying to a person who's tired and sick. Worse, important orders or medicines can be overlooked in the confusion. Whoever is the nurse in charge should give instructions to a helper when she needs assistance or if she must leave the house.

Hand in hand with this rule go common-sense "musts" for the nurse herself: enough sleep, enough fresh air, regular meals so she won't become ill, too, just when she's most needed. So often a misguided sense of devotion to duty causes this to happen. If you're carrying the double burden of nursing and keeping house, you just must be as firm with yourself about rest and regularity of meals as you are with your patient.

"I WANT TO BE ALONE"

A separate room for a person who's ill is so desirable that it's worth a good deal of rearranging of the house, if that's necessary. Clear the closets and bureau drawers of other people's personal effects, so your patient won't be disturbed by someone's midnight fumbling for pajamas. Try to choose a room near the bathroom.

When a long illness is anticipated, take away unneeded furniture, hangings and doodads. Walls tinted in soft colors, wallpaper of a gentle pattern, are more restful to a sick person's eyes than the gay goings on he might have enjoyed in healthy days.

If the illness is a communicable disease, everything will have to be thoroughly scrubbed after the siege is over, so simple washable curtains and bureau covers, furniture that won't be ruined by cleaning, are best.

The bed should be single, if possible, and flanked by a near-by table so the person who's confined to bed can reach out and easily get at tissues, drinking water, and a small bell or buzzer. If the patient is a child, shelves for toys and books should be within easy reach.

Home beds are so low, as a rule, that it becomes very tiring to bend over constantly when bathing your patient, or making his bed up freshly. Spare yourself backaches by sliding off the casters and placing under each leg a block of wood, big enough to raise the bed to hospital height.

DRESSING A SICKBED

Keep satin comforters and lacy spreads until all's well again; at this time washable bedclothing is best. Protect the mattress with a washable pad, and if the patient is a child, better add a rubber or waterproof sheet. During this sneezy season, one of the new electric blankets would be a delightfully comfortable covering, for electric blankets adjust themselves to ups and downs in temperature. Since this is the only blanket you need use, your patient won't feel weighted down or smothered, yet he'll be cozy. The new ones are washable too.

A BATH IN BED

The notion that sick people shouldn't be bathed because of the danger of taking cold is pretty old-fashioned. Of course you must take precautions to keep your patient from becoming chilled, but unless the doctor specifically forbids it, anyone confined to bed should have a complete cleansing bath daily. It not only refreshes and (Continued on Page 203)

Lunch for a would-be sailor. Down the hatch with the milk, Andrew.

BEING sick abed isn't any fun, but there's much you can do to make meals in bed fun to eat, even if the menus be limited to milk toast and chicken broth. Little Andrew Breidenbach must have all his meals in bed these days. When his appetite lags, we suggested that Mrs. Breidenbach play up to his yearning desire to be a sailor someday. She now occasionally serves his meals with nautical touches. A sailor's white hat, fish-shaped casseroles and salt and pepper shakers and the nautical place mat help create the illusion. He's delighted with this make-believe and rewards her by eating everything to the last bite. Ingenuity really pays, and if "I'm not hungry" rings in your ears, here are some ways to combat tray-meal boredom.

Your role. If you are worried or harried, try not to let it show when you bring in the tray at mealtime.

Children are little copycats, and when you can spare the time—perhaps at lunch—have your own meal at the bedside. How he eats depends on how he feels. Try to make him feel happy in spite of being ill.

★ Little Things That Count

Your best china and glass are none too good for the sickroom trays. Have you taken inventory lately of what you have on hand in the way of gadgets to make meals for one more interesting?

How about individual wooden salad bowls? They make salads more appealing and take up less room on the tray than salad plates.

A small teapot that can be used for hot chocolate or milk is good tray timber—prevents spilling in transit from kitchen to bedroom. Children particularly like to pour their own.

A small cream pitcher and sugar bowl and individual salt and pepper shakers, the last in as many gay forms as you can collect, help to make tray service more attractive.

Colored paper place mats and paper napkins are inexpensive props—save laundry and make it possible to change the color scheme of the tray setup oftener.

A glass bell to put over the hot food to keep it warm, individual casseroles and shirred-egg dishes are all good props for tray meals.

Solitaires. One-of-a-kind setups in inexpensive but gay china and glass make it possible to change the color scheme of the tray now and then.

Toaster on location. Bring in the toaster too. The smell of toast being made will perk up the appetite.

A matter of choice. Instead of serving one apple, one pear or whatever the fruit may be for the tray meal, bring in an attractively arranged bowl of fruit. Choosing your own has much more appeal.

★ Make it Easy to Eat

For instance, bread and butter can be made into little sandwiches. Roll them up sometimes and tuck a spray of cress in each end.

Mix toasted croutons with the soft-cooked eggs. Tastes better. The toast soaks up liquid egg—no drip!

I vote for straws—for eggnogs, fruit juices, and so on.

Put cut fruit on toothpicks. Stick into an orange or apple for a pincushion. No fork or spoon needed.

Don't serve too much—better to have smaller meals more often. Sometimes it may seem more propitious to have an auxiliary tray for the dessert—let it be a surprise.

ariety Show

Even though you may have to llow a definite diet list, the more riety you can contrive with the lowed foods, the more successful ou will be in having the food eaten. Out-of-season treats are well orth their cost. The first straw-erries, the first asparagus mean uch.

oup makes a frequent appear-nce. Vary its appearance as much s possible. Try serving chopped arsley, chopped chives or grated aw carrot as a garnish—a different arnish each time you serve it. Buy n assortment of crackers so a little ariety can be achieved in this anner. Now and then fix a bowl f croutons that can be dished into he soup from the tray.

Fruit is a staple in get-well-uick menus. Float slices of fruit n the fruit juice; serve good, well-lavored fruit compotes instead of plain unimaginative prunes. Fresh ineapple is coming to market; it as a cooling, fresh taste when spiked with mint. Serve fruit sher-et in orange cups. Bake bananas and serve in a shell with a glisteny crown of fresh strawberries. Lemon ce, made easily in refrigerator and spread over cooked fruits, can be re-firmed or chilled in freezing tray. A baked Alaska doesn't always involve ice cream and cake—a baked apple (remove the skin) "Alaskas" beauti-fully and tastes good too. Meringue shells are light, crisp fairy food and wouldn't be amiss in any convales-cent diet. Fill them with fresh or cooked fruits. Would inspire anyone, sick or well.

On the same tack: an honest-to-goodness peach Melba would make a de luxe treat when you're tempted to inspire your bed guest—peach half, ice cream and raspberry sauce, simple but simply delicious. Mold rice sometimes in individual ring molds and serve stewed fruit in the center—or creamed chicken if that's on your list.

In the Mood for Fun

There comes a time when your tray meals can be more normal meals. The danger's past, but several days more in bed are still "doctor's orders." That's the time to outdo yourself. Children, particularly, are the hardest to keep amused at this stage. They feel well enough to be up, but mother says no. Capitalize on the season. Now in February you have three holidays to exploit—Lincoln's Birthday, Washington's Birthday and Valentine's Day. Little favors or party gadgets add fun to an occasional tray.

Even in the winter children love the idea of a picnic. Bring in the food in a picnic basket. Let the child unwrap the food and do his own investigating.

★ Traytime Wiles

A new book brought in with the milk toast can't be managed every day, but some little something as a surprise now and then works wonders if your "patient" is difficult to interest in eating.

Mail on the breakfast tray, for instance, costs only a postage stamp, and it's a sure-fire cheer-up. Pass the word along to friends, or write a few amusing notes or rhymes yourself, if you have the time.

And here's a point: After a long tiresome day in bed, there's nothing that does quite so much to create an appetite for the dinner tray—even if it's to be just chicken broth—as "dressing" for dinner. If it's a "she," keep her prettiest robe or bed jacket for this once-a-day dress-up. A ribbon for her hair sets a woman up, too—whether she's four or forty.

THE EDUCATION OF EUGENE MILEY

mental state. Listlessly he picked up a catalogue announcing correspondence courses offered by the United States Armed Forces Institute, a G. I. education unit. His eye ran up and down the catalogue, and suddenly it caught a word that rang a bell in his mind. Accounting!

Miley sat up in bed. He called for the education officer, a capable young ex-teacher named Captain Kirk. Kirk looked in the catalogue, at the place where Miley's finger was pointing. The officer shook his head.

"I'm sorry, Gene," he explained quietly. "You have to have a high-school education to study accounting."

"Then give me some high-school education," said Miley.

"Gladly," said Kirk, laughing and slapping Miley on the back.

By the time Miley left the hospital two months later, he had completed three bookkeeping courses and an algebra course; he had passed an Army examination which gave him credit for his first year in high school; and he had become fast friends with Captain Kirk, who devoted a few minutes of each day trying to talk the veteran into continuing his education.

But as his discharge time drew near, Miley developed grave doubts.

"You owe it to yourself and to the country," said Kirk. "A man with your native intelligence is doing a lot of people a great injustice by not getting an education and going into a profession."

"I'm too old to start studying," said Miley.

"You owe it to your children—when you have them," Kirk said.

"If I don't get back soon, Mr. Yeager will be givin' my bricklayin' job to someone else," said Miley.

"But the Government supports you when you go to school," said Kirk.

Miley shook his head with Pennsylvania Dutch stubbornness. "Bricklayin' pays good money," he said.

But then Miley met Frances Baker.

Immediately he became conscious of the fact that she was a college graduate. He listened to her talk, and for the first time in his life he was awed and afraid. He was ashamed to admit that he hadn't even completed the eighth grade in school. He spent hours toiling over a dictionary and a grammar book every time he sat down to write a half-page letter to her. He lived in dread of making spelling and grammatical errors. He spoke of the possibility of going to school, but he always made it sound as if it were college he was talking about.

Quietly Frances worked on him. Soon Miley was saying to himself, "A feller in my condition gets to feel like a freak, unless he's got something that makes him feel he's going to amount to something after all." He realized that he needed both the education and Frances for this psychological uplift, and that the education was doubly important because he was afraid that without it he couldn't hold Frances.

One day he said to her, "I'm goin' to school." He grew red. "It's only high school."

"I know," she said, smiling. "You can get through the accelerated course very quickly. And we can see each other week ends."

The week after he was discharged from the Army, Miley received a letter from the Veterans Administration informing him that he was entitled to rehabilitation education under Public Law 16. He filled out the application blank and mailed it back. The Veterans Administration people gave him tests and sent him to Philadelphia. That's how he ended up in Mr. Brunton's office at the Board of Public Education that rainy morning.

The Philadelphia high-school program for veterans is a huge, sprawling affair, and if Miley had wished he could have gone to t ultramodern Bok and Dobbins vocatior high schools to learn a semiskilled tra quickly, or a near-professional trade, li television engineering or air conditioning, a year or so.

In Bok and Dobbins there are forty-thr different vocational subjects for veterar ranging from tailoring to commercial art. T Philadelphia school system got a head sta in this respect, because during the w Brunton ran one of the country's bigge war-production-training centers in these sar classrooms, turning out some 225,000 train adult war-worker specialists, nearly one six the population of the city. On August 2 1943, Brunton got the first rehabilitatio training contract issued by the Veterans A ministration in this war. He also inherited great deal of air-conditioning, television, r dar and refrigeration equipment. Immec ately he began converting the war-trainii facilities into his veterans' vocational pr gram, retaining the best instructors he h been able to snare from local industry. Wh this was set, he instituted his accelerat academic-high-school program—the cour in which Miley was enrolled.

At first there was just a trickle of veterai attracted to the Philadelphia veterans' ser ice. Some classes consisted of one vet and o teacher. But it didn't take long for th Philadelphia Story to spread, and soon mo than 2000 ex-G. I.'s will be enrolled. App cations are pouring in from Europe, the P cific and from veterans living all over t country at the rate thirty-five a day. The m get free tuition, free boo and subsistence, und Public Law 16, or the G. Bill of Rights. The scho system collects from th Veterans Administratic the cost of teachers' sa aries and of books, suppli and equipment which b come the property of th veteran, the sum charge making it possible to supply the veteran wit education without financial profit to th school district.

Miley was enrolled in the historic o Benjamin Franklin High School, which ha dles all veterans in the high-school-diplom course. He started out with two Englis courses, biology, current history, geometr commercial law. He had five classes a day, fi days a week. Since thirty hours of classwor in a course constitute a half year's cred in the veterans' accelerated program, th meant that he was proceeding at the rate one full year's high-school credit every twel weeks. In the beginning, Miley's aptitude were much the same as they had been i grammar school. He was excellent in math matics, pretty close to poor in everythin else. He had forgotten what little spelling h knew, and his speech and writing were fille with farm colloquialisms like "Baked pota toes are my favor*yte*"; "The enemy snuck u to within hand-grenade range during th night"; and "When I got hit, I didn't fe nothing until I got to the hos-pittle." He sai "Youse," and "Where's he at?" In a test t determine his knowledge of sentence struc ture, he got only twelve sentences correct ou of twenty.

In his one math course—geometry—he fe completely at ease. But here he ran into different type of problem. There were few ve erans in the accelerated-high-school cours then, and it was necessary to assign Miley t one class with ordinary high-school sopho mores. This one class turned out to be geom etry. It was a tough experience. Mile worked alone, way out ahead of the class. H more or less set his own pace, with M Nassau, the instructor, tutoring him. Th fourteen-year-old kids turned and grimace at the serious, hard-working Miley as if h were indeed a freak. Also, they annoyed hir with a great deal of adolescent chirping and name-calling behind the back of Mr. Nassau, who is hard of hearing.

But then one day Miley came to class on crutches, with his right pants leg neatly tucked up. The stump had become infected and he couldn't wear the artificial leg. The kids took one look at Miley that day, and then they couldn't look any more. There weren't many grimaces or noises in the class after that.

From the very beginning, Miley set a Spartan schedule for himself. He attended classes from nine in the morning until three in the afternoon. He studied at home from seven P.M. until midnight, or later. He spent his afternoons shopping for food and cleaning his furnished room, which he had found by answering an ad in one of the newspapers. The room was a cluttered little cubicle in a slum tenement. It was furnished with a bed, a stove, an icebox and a sink. He shared a bath in the hall. The floor of the room was covered with rotting linoleum, and Miley spent a good deal of time trying to scrub away the black spots which appeared on it every day. He dried his wash on a line strung across the room and studied at a table littered with papers, textbooks and other sundry literature. He always kept a pair of crutches near the bed, in case anything happened to his artificial leg.

Miley hardly ever left this room except to shop or to go to classes. He got up at 8:15 A.M., ate some dry cereal, boiled up some coffee, and rushed down to catch a streetcar to the school. In the evening he cooked himself a supper of canned vegetables, baked potatoes and eggs. Occasionally, the neighborhood butcher would let him buy a little meat. He scarcely ever went to a movie or a baseball game, and he found time to get home to see his mother only one week end a month. He simply didn't have enough money. While he was in school the Government gave him $92 a month for subsistence, in lieu of his pension. Of this, he paid $26 a month for his room, and food cost him approximately $48 a month. He hoarded his remaining few dollars for his precious week-end visits with Frances.

"I never was one for splurgin'," he says, "but I sure did have trouble makin' ends meet."

During those first few weeks, Frances had a difficult time with Miley. He was morose and unsure of himself. Frances was a yeoman second class, holding down a pretty important job in the Bureau of Personnel, and often she had to work on Saturdays. Then, Miley would come to Washington, lugging his books, and study in his hotel room all day Saturday, waiting for her. Other week ends she went up to Philadelphia.

Once, when they were walking down Market Street in Philadelphia, he turned to her with pain in his face, and said, "Why do people stare at me?"

"Don't be so conceited," she shot back. "You're no different from anyone else, and no one knows about your leg. If it's those Wacs you're talking about, it was your platinum-blond hair they were looking at—not your leg."

Another time, Miley sat around brooding. "I'm so worried about geometry," he said.

"Why?" Frances asked.

"Oh, I have to ask the teacher to explain things in class, and I'm embarrassed about asking questions because of my age."

"You go right up there and ask him," Frances had to say. "That's exactly what the teacher's there for."

This uncertainty about himself kept up until one week end a month or so after he started classes. He was visiting in Washington then. That week, Frances had been assigned the chore of teaching mathematics to a group of Bureau of Personnel sailors studying for higher ratings. It was a long time since she even had looked at a math book.

She said to Miley, "Darling, what's the formula for finding the hypotenuse of a triangle?"

Miley looked at her, stunned. For a moment he couldn't speak. Then he said incredulously, "You want me to show you something educated?"

"Of course," she said. "You know more about math than I do."

For the first time since he resumed his education, Miley felt a happy, surging feeling of progress about himself. He tore into the mathematical formulas, nearly overwhelming her with everything he knew. Almost miraculously, from that point on, the doubts and uncertainties were gone. Miley finished the first twelve-week period with B's in every subject.

In his second twelve-week period (corresponding to the third year in high school), Miley took American history, Spanish, trigonometry, algebra, office practice and English. He continued his proved excellence in mathematics, and did surprisingly well in history and Spanish. In English there was definite improvement. He didn't have to work at it quite so hard. He took the sentence-structure test again. He got eighteen correct out of twenty.

By this time, the winter of 1945, so many veterans had come to the school that now Miley was in classes made up exclusively of ex-G. I.'s. The veterans' classes were handled by specially picked teachers—the best in the entire school system—men like Dr. Iradel Aucott in English, Samuel Lepow in biology and Rayton Kleppinger in mathematics. All these teachers are selected by the principal, Charles Williams, himself rated one of the finest educators in the East. Williams received carte blanche from Dr. Alexander Stoddard, Philadelphia's internationally known superintendent of schools, to request anyone he wished. And capable, sincere Williams, who honestly thinks teaching veterans is the Olympus of education, went out and rounded up the cream.

These veterans' classes are a strange, exhilarating experience. You look around at the mature men and you feel as if you are in some university graduate college. Then they begin reciting, and you are jarred back to the realization that this is a secondary school. In their discussions, there is a curious mixture of maturity and mental adolescence, worldliness and naïveté.

Miley's English class with Doctor Aucott is a good example. The class was held in an old-fashioned schoolroom lined with dusty cabinets containing specimens of anthracite coal and jars filled with labeled preserved insects and chemicals. On the wall there was a poster of the Statue of Liberty with the legend underneath, "Pour des jours meilleurs, U. S. War Bonds." The men sprawled around in their shirt sleeves and smoked. One man wore an Army officer's pink pants and a sun-tan shirt. There were two Negro veterans, a man with a handsome German military wrist watch, another with plastic-surgery bandages on the left side of his face, and a veteran in G. I. pants with tattooed arms and no right ear. They were shooting questions at Aucott about points of grammar they didn't understand. Aucott, a little, gray-haired man with glasses, stood at the blackboard with his sleeves rolled up.

Miley said, "I have trouble figuring out the difference between the conjunctions 'since,' 'because' and 'as.'"

"Gene, it's just a tossup," Aucott shot back. "You use the one you like best in this case."

A short, dark boy raised his hand stiffly. "You say, 'He made a beautiful forward pass,'" he said. "Do you say, 'He made a pass beautiful'?"

"I don't see how you can make a pass beautiful," said Aucott. "Once it's started, it's one thing or the other. But you can throw a pass beautifully."

A good-looking man in his early thirties raised his hand.

"Question, Bob?" said Aucott.

"Yes," said Bob. "I can't figure out this dangling-participle business. I need some work in that."

Aucott started to write a sentence on the blackboard.

Miley jumped up. "It's just the same as a lot of bad minstrel jokes we used to hear in USO shows in Italy. Like, 'For sale, a piano, by an old lady with mahogany legs.'"

Nobody laughed. They all gravely noted down the example. This continued until the bell rang. And then they were reluctant to stop work. Miley and the others kept asking questions while the high-school kids milled about wildly in the hall. When the veterans finally did straggle out to go to their next class, Aucott was limp.

"But," he said, "this is pure education, the kind of eagerly accepted teaching, without discipline or trimmings, that every teacher dreams about. I guess," he said, dreaming, "I'd rather teach these guys than be president of the University of Pennsylvania."

Samuel Lepow had an equally lively time in one of Miley's biology classes. Sitting around in a circle with a small group, and smoking his pipe, the brilliant, balding teacher was discussing the acceptance of scientific facts. "No one," he said, by way of illustration, "has ever seen an electric current."

Miley raised his hand. "They told us in a radar lecture once," he said, "that someone at Columbia University did take X-ray defraction photographs—I think that's what they called it—of an electron."

Lepow had to backtrack.

A moment later the teacher ran into trouble again. "People get virus diseases," he said, "and yet we can't see a virus." This time an ex-Medical Corps man protested that viruses had been seen by means of a new electron microscope. Miley concurred. He had learned that in the hospital.

But then Lepow, working with professional ease, turned the men's military knowledge to their own advantage in learning other things. "In protoplasm," he said, "there is a tremendous surface for chemical reactions, the same as with activated carbon in a gas mask."

"Carbon?" asked Miley, perplexed. Then he answered himself. "Oh, yes," he said. "Like the arcs in an ack-ack searchlight."

On the whole, the veterans get along beautifully with the teachers in this new Philadelphia plan. The classes really are like bull sessions, and by a special arrangement the veterans eat lunch in the faculty lunchroom with the teachers, instead of in the crowded school cafeteria with the kids. It is a student-tutor rather than a pupil-teacher relationship. This is because each veteran starts classes immediately after his discharge. He doesn't have to wait for the next term to begin. Thus, in a class of twelve men, you might have twelve men each at different stages of the course. The teacher, accordingly, must function as a private tutor to each veteran.

Miley did well under this system. He finished the second twelve-week period, again with B's in every subject. He wrote to Frances, "I think I know now how the guys in Italy must have felt when they crossed over that last mountain. From now on it should be downhill."

But Miley was a trifle overoptimistic. In his third and final twelve-week period, he took physics, advanced geometry, advanced algebra, Spanish and English. He became a bit too cocky in physics, which he considered just another math course, and he nearly took a header. In English, he had trouble again. He began the semester in a blaze of glory, scoring twenty out of twenty in the sentence-structure test. But then shrewd Doctor Aucott began to give the class compositions to write. Miley's compositions were elementary literary efforts like, The Furniture vs. the Dog Home. He listened open-mouthed, however, to the mature work of some of his fellow veterans.

A Negro ex-Army captain named Kenneth Price wrote a piece that was a social document in the rough. It was called My Introduction to Jim Crow. It was the story of his first trip to the South—to attend officer-candidate school. Mr. Berger, another of the extremely capable teachers, read a piece by an Air Corps veteran entitled Philadelphia's Third-rate Airport. For political and economic reasoning, this high-school composition was as good as any editorial on the subject in the Philadelphia newspapers.

Miley listened to these, and then went home and tried desperately to duplicate them. He wrote theme after theme in an attempt to master the language. He began to think social and economic thoughts that would have been completely foreign to him a few months before. He devoured the editorial pages of the newspapers. He bought high-brow magazines and struggled through them. One afternoon he spent three hours eagerly trying to converse in Spanish with some six-year-old Puerto Rican children in the neighborhood. Even the literature in his room reflected the metamorphosis Eugene Miley had undergone. Scattered among the litter of papers on his table were Tolstoy's War and Peace, Emily Hahn's China to Me, Somerset Maugham's The Razor's Edge and a copy of the Saturday Review of Literature.

Frances, more than anyone else, noticed the change in Miley. When he first had come to see her in Washington, he was shy and close-mouthed among her Wave friends. He scarcely ever said a word when a discussion got under way. Now she couldn't shut him up. He chattered incessantly about the war and strategy and reconversion and politics and religion.

But the most permanent record of Miley's development was in his letters to Frances. His first letter to her was dated October 20, 1944, a short time after they first met on the bus. He wrote then:

Dear Francis: It has been two week since I last saw you. Are you still going to school? I want to but I got to wait till I hear from Veterans Administration. I am going to be in Washington in a few week. I got to go to see my former captain about some papers. If you have any free time when I get there how about seeing a show with me.

So long and good luck,
GENE.

This letter was written in a painful childish script and every word obviously had been checked in the dictionary before he wrote it. Nine words were erased and corrected.

On October 12, 1945, a little less than a year later, Frances received this letter:

To my Angel: I was in a bookstore this afternoon and saw a set of Shakespeare's plays. They are put up in two volumes. I know I said one time that I didn't think Shakespeare was so hot, but I changed my mind. Do you think I was foolish to buy them?

I'm sorry to hear that your mother's sister isn't any better. Is it the one I met? I hope your aunt soon gets well. I can't imagine either your mother or your aunt being sick. They seemed so jolly and full of life that evening we were together. Here's hoping the next letter I get will say she's well or at least greatly improved.

Well, Honey, one more week of high school! I'm not worried about any kind of studying I do from now on because I just can't fail with you backing me up. All my love,
GENE.

This letter was neatly typewritten. He had dashed it off between his physics and English classes at school.

One day last October, Miley climbed onto a streetcar and rode over to the University of Pennsylvania on the other side of town. He had only a few more hours of work to do then in order to qualify for a full-credit high-school diploma. He had completed three years of high school in exactly nine months.

At the University, he walked into a room filled with veterans and sat down. An instructor walked in and passed out papers. Ex-bricklayer's apprentice Eugene Miley was taking college-entrance examinations. When he finished, he was sure he had failed. The other veterans were nearly all former officers, or boys just recently out of high school. Miley, at twenty-eight, was easily the oldest man in the room.

Miley was so nervous and upset about the results that a week or so later Charlie Williams, the principal, phoned Dr. Sherman Oberly, dean of admissions at the University.

"Miley?" said Oberly. "Let's see. Verbal examination—the upper twenty per cent of the class; mathematics—the upper fifteen per cent; the social sciences—the upper ten per cent. An unusually high score, Mr. Williams. Miley can start classes, under the G. I. Bill of Rights, with the new freshman class on November first. That man should make a brilliant accountant someday."

When Miley heard this, he trembled all over and shook Charlie Williams' hand for nearly five minutes. Then he went home and sat for a long time among the welter of books and papers and cereals and crutches, staring silently off into space. Then he went downstairs and put through a long-distance phone call to Frances in Washington. He told Frances what had happened, and she began to cry with joy. She couldn't stop crying all night.

MEET ANDREW BREIDENBACH

surer masculine touch in collaboration on the P-40. During the first and worst months, it was Andy who did most of the food shopping. Pauline left the house only for a rapid trip to the supermarket on Saturday, leaving Andy in charge—she still can't make church with him, preferring to stick with her responsibility as secretary of the Sunday school. Then, the moment she returns, Andy dashes for church to carry out his deacon's function of passing the plate and ushering. Fortunately, Resurrection Lutheran Church—both the Breidenbachs were reared Lutheran—is only two blocks away.

Now that the little fellow makes another step toward recovery every few weeks, things are easier. Gradually he has worked into taking his own baths in the tub, into getting out of bed for an occasional meal, into sitting outside an hour or two in his chair, when weather permits. Latest and most thrilling privilege has been a weekly trip in the car to LaGuardia Airport, where the big transports swoop down and thunder away, trailing glamour for all small boys. It is hard for people who never dealt with TB to realize the emotional impact of these gradual bits of coming alive again, appearing successively as tokens of hard-earned hope and progress.

But the conscientious Breidenbachs stick to restrictions too. Even though infection is no longer a hazard, they keep Andrew's dishes and towels separate as ■ precaution, and any member of the family who gets ■ cold stays in absolute exile in the farthest reaches of the apartment until completely recovered.

Company is now allowed in moderation. Best of all, from the parents' point of view, is the home teacher, sent by the public schools for an hour and a half thrice weekly to get Andrew shifted back into an educational pattern. When he was sent to bed, he was about to be skipped a grade, and his bright, restless little mind badly needs the stimulus of the lessons that he has been so long without. Patience and tact are very necessary, however, to getting ■ sick child back into the study habit. Pauline comes through well again. On the alternate days, when teacher does not come, she "opens school" herself by giving tongue "ting-a-ling" at ten sharp. Toys and storybooks are swept off the gay counterpane, and spellers and readers appear. She keeps him at it only an hour and never scolds if listlessness sets in. Instead,

Would You Choose A Different Husband

if you could go back and do it all again? "No!" says pretty thirty-three-year-old Kitty Quinn. If she were to go back and make any revisions, she'd start by marrying handsome John Quinn the moment she met him at Miss Kate McCafferty's Dancing Academy—then there would have been three more fun-filled years with her extravagantly Irish husband and the nine young Quinns. It's a big job for Kitty. She hangs out eighteen sheets, twenty diapers on washday, packs five lunch boxes on school days, serves eleven suppers every night. John's not-so-big income leaves little room for luxuries, but there's no limit to the laughter and chatter that fill their neat six-room house when eleven Quinns are home in full force. Don't miss this sturdy, good-natured family in she says with just enough burlesque of severity, "Now, Andrew, I'm going to have to send a note home to your mother. Think of the example you're setting the other children!" Which Andrew, who has a sense of humor as sharp as it is unmistakable, loves.

In the early days Pauline kept a reserve supply of dime-store toys and comic books to be drawn on when the first symptom of fretfulness appeared. It worked like a charm on this sweet-natured youngster, who often urges his mother to "go out to the movies with daddy. I'll be O.K., mom—go on, I don't need you at all."

There was worry about oversensitive nerves for a while. To cut down the wear and tear of Christmas, they divided up festivities, with Andrew getting his presents Christmas Eve and the rest of the family holding off till next day. But even so, when Andrew saw the little tree on the dining table with the bright packages spread underneath, all for him, he burst into uncontrollable tears. Now, with schoolwork and excursions, things are much better and he can more easily follow the lady doctor's comradely exhortation to "let your mother do the worrying—your job is to get well."

The called-for diet, including much choice red meat as well as supplementary tomato and orange juice, would have been a serious wartime problem if the local ration board had not readily supplied the extra points that the doctor requested, and if the Breidenbachs' butcher had not been a fine guy about putting special somethings aside for the sick boy, never mind what the other customers got.

All such special measures are expensive, of course, but Andy is long used to taking it on the financial chin. In the past two years the medical load on income has been all the heavier for Audree's tooth straightening, which always costs like smoke. Any ideas Andy had of putting away a nest egg against the youngsters' college have gone glimmering. Still, his shoulders are broad and his industry bottomless. This apparently Irish but actually strictly German-descended good citizen early learned hard work and thrifty habits.

If they ever get out from under their present difficulties, maybe the talent for thrift can reassert itself. Right now the major problem is finding new corners to cut. Andy hasn't had a new suit in two years or an overcoat in six, though his business calls for neat dressing. Pauline's clothes budget is a wry family joke: "I don't go anywhere, so what do I need of clothes?" a point made wistfully but with perfect honesty. Andy lugs the heavy washing personally to the laundry plant—they have no washing machine—to save 15 per cent, and Pauline rips Andrew's worn sheets down the middle and rehems them—if they get too bad, they are cut up for pillow slips. But things are already changing a little. She actually saw a movie the other night and enjoyed it. Not that it would matter to her if she never stepped outside the house again, provided her shockheaded, brisk-chirping boy was all right.

The Breidenbachs are making a brilliant success out of second best. First best would have been ample sanatorium room—Andrew had to wait months before he could even get into the one they tried—in a setup especially aimed at children, whose needs in pulmonary TB are by no means identical with those of adolescents or adults. Society did not do right by this family in their time of need.

But they are not bitter at all. The little fellow is coming along—the doctors say so, the X rays say so, Pauline's heart says so. Now, when he is tucked away, sleeping his healing sleep, and she sits by the radio knitting a pair of mittens for Audree and waiting for Andy to come home, she can recall without wanting to cry young Andrew's inevitable answer when somebody asks what he wants to be:

"I want to be in the Coast Guard. The Navy's O.K., but it won't have much to do when I'm grown up because there won't be any wars."

BEDSIDE MANNERS

elieves the fatigue and boredom of lying in ed, but a bath does so much toward making ıe sick person feel more like his usual well-roomed self.

Before you begin, have the room com-ortably warm, all windows closed, all drafts ıut out. Gather everything you'll need—a asin of warm water, a pitcher of hot for re-lls, soap, washcloths, towels—in a conven-nt place. Protect the bed table, if you use , with paper towels or a bath mat. Check our supplies carefully—when your patient's l soapy and dewy is no time to discover ıat the towels are still in the linen closet. f course, wash your own hands first and re-ıove all jewelry.

It's a good idea to keep a soft, old blanket ıst for baths, to wrap your patient in after moving all bedclothing. An extra shower ırtain covered with a Turkish towel would e good for protecting the mattress. If you ıove the bathee to the side of the bed, close you, you will find that your job will be ıuch easier.

The trick is to do a small portion com-letely, while keeping the rest of the body hich isn't being washed covered cozily. on't ever let the washcloth become drippy!

Face first, then one m—washed, rinsed, ried and tucked back nder the enveloping lanket before there's ıy chance for goose esh! Then the other m, then the chest, nd so on down to ıe last toe.

A dash of rubbing cohol or a favorite ghtly scented co-gne, then a dusting bath powder, make pleasant finish for ıe back or wherever ere's any pressure. ut in this cold eather, don't forget warm the alcohol st. B-r-r-r—what a illy shock that can e!

Soap-and-water ampoos really ouldn't be at-mpted by anyone ut a graduate nurse. est for an amateur keep her patient's air looking attractive by brushing and rub-ng it with towels, using a prepared dry ampoo or a bit of hair tonic on absorbent tton.

ISINFECTING LINENS ND UTENSILS

Bed linens, towels and pajamas can be aced at once to soak in a large receptacle lled with cold water, to which a little wash-g soda has been added. When it's conven-nt during the day, boil them in the same ater. Afterward they can go safely into the gular laundry.

Washbasins and bedpans should be scalded ch day, and when the illness is all over, oiled for fifteen minutes.

UIET, PLEASE

Small repeated noises—a curtain flapping, clock ticking, high heels tapping on a bare oor, newspapers rustling stealthily—can ritate a sick person to distraction, much ıore than one big crash of a tray!

A drinking tumbler placed upside down ver the clock or watch, which you really eed to have in a sickroom, will muffle its cking. A towel folded over both doorknobs ill prevent the door from being jarringly ammed.

WENTY-FOUR-HOUR DUTY

You'll probably find it best to get up at ast a half hour earlier than usual so you can give your patient breakfast before the rest of the family appears.

Write the doctor's orders, with the proper time for giving each treatment or medicine indicated, on a chart and fit your housework into the chinks around those. An alarm clock or timing clock will be a big help to summon you out of the kitchen or wherever you're working, when it's time for another dose of medicine.

Mrs. Breidenbach often combines her housework with keeping Andrew company. For example, she always irons in the dining room, from which his friendly many-windowed room, formerly the living room, opens. For the whole afternoon they talk and sing together, with "Beep," the canary, whistling an accompaniment, while shirts and sheets are smoothed beneath her flying iron.

After breakfast, a person who's ill usually likes to rest and perhaps read a bit, before being made ready for the day. This is your chance to take care of menu planning, ordering, straightening up of living rooms, or any pressing household duty.

Then do your patient's room and give him his bath, change the bed and settle him with books or toys, if amusements are permitted. If he's well enough to enjoy a radio, be sure it's placed where he can reach the controls and tune in favorite programs.

Your patient should have lunch, too, before the rest of the family. Afterward, while he's napping, try to fit in a few minutes' rest for yourself.

You'll find that a bed patient is likely to be a bit fretful and weary in the late afternoon. That's when a soothing alcohol rub (if prescribed by the doctor), a refreshing face wash and brush up, straightening his room and plumping up pillows, will do much to make him feel happier.

After supper, "unwinding" toward sleeptime is essential to your patient's welfare. If he's allowed to have visitors, try to screen out the well-meaning but misguided ones who are mournful or noisily jovial.

Before lights out, another freshening up, back rub, perhaps a hot-water bottle at the feet or a cup of warmed milk may help him relax. Then—absolute quiet.

NURSE'S AIDES

If the doctor says "plenty of fruit juices," be sure they're fresh and chilled. A generous vacuum bottle on the bedside table allows the patient who is able to help himself.

Remember to pour medicine from a bottle with the label side up. That way, sticky trickles won't obliterate instructions.

If your patient, too, is a little boy, perhaps you'll like Mrs. Breidenbach's idea of having Andrew wear shirts in bed during the day. She feels that not only is it good psychologically, but that he feels fresher when he changes into pajamas at night.

A number of good, simply covered pillows, little ones and big ones, will be invaluable in keeping your patient comfortable. Use them for all they're worth.

TO YOUR HEALTH!

Much as we like to write of things that will be helpful to you, we sincerely hope this is one batch of information you'll have little use for! At least not for more than a day or two, nursing the mildest kind of sniffle.

WITH BUT A SINGLE THOUGHT

Worcestershire sauce. Add 1 tablespoon of grated onion. So far so good. And now to go farther. Flatten out the raw chicken breasts firmly. Sprinkle lightly with salt and pepper.

Spread a generous amount of the liver mixture on each chicken breast, keeping it well in toward the center. Lay a sliver of butter or margarine, about the size of a nickel, and a leg bone on each breast. Roll the chicken up around the leg bones; be careful to keep the pâté from oozing out. Oozing is like driving in the center of the road. Soon there's nothing left. Secure in several places with toothpicks. Chill the rolled breasts and then roll in fine cracker crumbs, then in beaten egg and then in cracker crumbs again (just the old croquette stuff), being sure that every spot is covered with egg and crumbs.

Fry in deep fat about five minutes. Keep heat fairly low, about 350° F., after first quick browning, so chicken will be sure to be cooked and browned. Take out the toothpicks. (Save for kindling.) Fry just before serving, so that, when the chicken is cut into, the center will be very soft and juicy.

Serve with a good cream sauce. Or you might try a musical note here. A valentine sauce called:

SAUCE FIGARO

To 1 pint of rich cream sauce add ¼ to ⅓ cup of canned tomato sauce or Italian tomato paste. Season with salt and pepper and Worcestershire sauce—but go easy on the last named.

Would you have thought it? When you see a nice, large, not too rocky avocado in the greengrocer's window, do you instinctively think of salad and shrimp? Put it from you and take home the avocado to another destiny. It will repay you as a nickel in the street found at the full of the moon. Of course you know what that brings you. But that isn't the way I discovered a magical use for avocados, and one worthy of this occasion and many others.

AVOCADO FRITTERS

Peel a large avocado and cut it in rings. Have ready the juice of 1 lemon to which you have added ½ teaspoon of chili powder and 2 tablespoons of Worcestershire sauce or any other highly seasoned sauce. Lay the avocado rings in this mixture for ten or fifteen minutes. Remove and season very well with salt and pepper. Dip in crumbs, then in beaten egg and then in crumbs again, and fry in deep hot fat at 375° F., just long enough to brown. They cook as quick as you can say "knife"—or almost. Drain on paper towels. You can fry these fritters first and keep them hot. They act better in the warming oven than the chicken breasts. But hot they ought to be.

Now arrange your platter with a bed of perfectly boiled rice, the chicken breasts and the avocado fritters on slices of sautéed pineapple. You'll find a harmony of flavors here like the strings of a symphony.

ASPARAGUS WITH LEMON BUTTER

Well, it will probably have to be canned or frozen, and very good too. That is, unless you come across the first shoots crowding up as you shovel out the clothesline. It's likely to be frozen then, all right. Cook the asparagus. Drain it well. Melt ¼ cup of butter or margarine. Add 2 tablespoons of lemon juice and 1 teaspoon or so of grated peel. Heat and beat to a singing froth, and there you are. Don't forget what you made it for. It's to be poured over the asparagus. Don't forget now.

Now to plan your valentine salad. There are thousands of them—and here is one I know you'll like.

ENDIVE SALAD FRANÇAISE

A simple endive salad dressed with a good French dressing as a base is just the ticket, as the boys are wont to put it. Add some chopped cress and chopped anchovies to the dressing. Some of those rolled anchovies, looking like little toy sea urchins taking an afternoon nap, are used as a garnish.

A sentimental cake. The old moss roses that grew in grandmother's garden and are valiantly trying to survive in mine have always appeared in every valentine I ever got. And roses are a part of love, aren't they? Surely if there is a valentine cake, it should be this one.

MOSS-ROSE CAKE

Any delicate white cake is all right if it is all right, for this. Put the layers together with an almond-cream filling.

ALMOND-CREAM FILLING

Take ¼ cup of flour and mix with ¾ cup of sugar and a little salt. Beat 2 eggs well, add 2 cups of scalded cream. Beat this slowly into the dry ingredients. Cook in a saucepan over low heat until thick. Beat very smooth with a wire whisk or egg beater. Cool and flavor with ½ teaspoon of vanilla and ½ teaspoon of almond flavoring. Put the three layers of cooled white cake together with the almond-cream filling. Frost the cake with a 3-egg-white boiled icing, or seven-minute icing. And who doesn't know what that is? Now here is where the moss comes in! Sprinkle the top and sides thickly with chopped unsalted pistachio nuts. (It takes about ½ pound of nuts, but it's a valentine, remember.) Make your rosebuds with a butter icing made with confectioner's sugar put through a pastry tube.

To go with the cake are valentines you can eat. The pink deliciousness of them will soon be only another memory. Maybe you'll want to cherish and treasure it. But one thing is sure—you can't keep ice cream indefinitely. So forget the bureau drawer and the old memento trunk up in the attic. And enjoy your valentines while ye may.

CHERRY-ICE-CREAM VALENTINES

Drain 1 can of pitted red sour cherries thoroughly. Soften an envelope of unflavored gelatin in ¼ cup of cold water. Cook 1 cup of cherry juice and 1 cup of sugar to a thick sirup. Pour in a fine stream on 4 egg whites, beaten stiff but not dry, beating constantly. Dissolve the softened gelatin over hot water and fold into the egg-white mixture. Cool until the mixture begins to thicken. Then fold in 2 cups of heavy cream, beaten stiff, and 2 teaspoons of lemon juice. Now add the cherry pulp, which has been put through a food chopper or puréed through a strainer and drained. Pour into one large or two small freezing trays. Set the refrigerator up to the coldest position. Freeze until firm without stirring. Warm the bottom of the tray a very little by using a cloth wrung out of hot water. Turn the ice cream out on a board. Cut out quickly with a heart-shaped cutter. Return the hearts to the freezing trays. Keep some distance apart. The remainder of the ice cream can be put in a mold or another freezing tray. After about half an hour's rechilling, pipe whipped cream around the edges of the hearts. Refreeze another half hour or so.

Who should know better! And now let me tell you a secret. When I was seven I had a lover and we were engaged—via the valentine route. But somewhere a hitch occurred. A drawback, let us say. He began to take to Sunday-school picnics and socials a more lissome lass and one whose mother let her hair run wild and who didn't have to wear spectacles. And so I thought, "A fig for all your valentines." I was jilted and knew it. But I bore up. Heartbreak, like eggs Benedict and carrots, was never my dish. I still get valentines. Love comes to me through the U. S. mail. And this little supper I planned as my valentine to you.

It's new! It's made with peanut butter! It's grand!

The DASH that makes the DISH

Curly Hair

HOMEMADE STYLE

Thousands of nimble-fingered American women are wearing homemade permanent ringlets this season. Here is how they do it.

IMPORTANT NOTE: Hair and scalp should be healthy before undertaking any experimental treatment. Bleached or dyed hair requires special handling. Always study directions in the package carefully, and follow them exactly.

WOMEN who hear of the home permanent for the first time immediately ask such questions as, "Is it terribly difficult? Is it good for all hair? Does it cost much? Does it take hours and hours? Could I do it?" We decided to find out the answers for ourselves. On this page are pictures of some of the young women who were members of a group who volunteered to do a home-waving operation, so that we could report it to you.

Is this wave all right for any kind of hair? The texture of the hair does not matter, but be sure hair and scalp are in good health.

What length should the hair be for best results? The most manageable, easy-to-wind length is from three to six inches. Since these curls are made by rolling the hair from the end up toward the scalp, it is obvious that a long strand when wound up becomes too bulky to curl successfully. Although short hair is best, it is possible to give a soft pageboy turn to longish hair.

How long does it take? This depends somewhat on your skill as a winder, and on whether you have any assistance. On an average, our volunteers found the job took about six hours, exclusive of drying after final setting.

Is it too difficult for the average woman to attempt? No, provided you adhere closely to the directions. For your own peace of mind you may want to make a test curl first. If so, you had better do this the day before you are planning the all-over wave. Have hair properly cut in advance, so you won't have to cut off any of your precious curl afterward. Wind smoothly and firmly, but don't stretch the hair. Follow the directions in your package.

How much does it cost? There are a number of kits on the market, varying in price from less than a dollar to about two dollars. In some sets the solutions are already mixed. In others, water must be added to dry ingredients.

What does a set include? All sets contain a wave preparation, a second preparation for neutralizing or setting the hair, and a bunch of curlers. There may also be a supply of small tissue squares to fold over the hair under the curler. This prevents frizzy ends. If no papers are supplied, very good ones can be made by cutting waxed sandwich paper into strips about two by four inches. About fifty curlers are usually supplied. This is enough for an average head, but if hair is heavy, an extra supply may be necessary. One of our ingenious testers made herself extra curlers out of twisted brown paper.

After shampoo and clear-water rinse, partly dried hair is di-ded. Work from front to back.

Inch-square strands are wet with wave solution; wound on curlers. nds are folded in tissue strips.

Completely wound in curlers, and dampened with wave solu-on, hair is turbaned for three hours.

4 More soaking—alternating fresh water and neutralizer, with great care. A most important step.

5 At last: rinsed and ready for styling. Yes, those ringlets are permanent; at least for a couple of months!

6 Final result: soft curls, after about six hours' intermittent work. Good rainy-day homework.

I NEED YOU AGAIN

After dinner they went in to look at the geraniums. When they returned, the captain was laughing. He slapped his thigh. "Shore, you'll get the hang of it, George. All you got to do is keep believin' them li'l' flowers'll grow, an' they'll grow."

"You see, Cathy," George said. "The captain says they'll be okay."

She didn't say anything. She smiled, and the captain went on to explain how George got the urge to grow things when he saw the African desert and the destroyed lands of Sicily and Southern Italy.

She listened for a time and then excused herself to write letters. She could hear them talking about moving to Texas, the things they would need the first year, the careful business of salt for cattle, branding, feed, fencing. The captain knew some good hands who had once worked the old Empire ranch in Arizona. She wanted to write to her mother, but her mother had a way of reading things into letters, and right now she felt terribly unsure of herself because she felt she ought to believe in him. She tried to think that this was something they talked of, the way grown men played a game of planning hunting and fishing trips that never would come off. Nothing more than that. She would not consider it seriously. George had always lived in the city, his life was here, his business.

That was the annoying thing about the captain. He did not belong to George's real life. He was left over from the Army. Before this, they had always known the same people, but now she no longer knew his friends. And for some reason these new friends seemed nearer to him, the best he had ever known. She had grown tired of hearing their names—Brady, Brisansky, Skeet Millrose, Halstead—how wonderful they all were. Except for the captain, she had known none of them, and they all seemed unreal, even comic, to her. She was glad, of course, that George had done so well. He went through basic training and advanced from a private through OCS to a first lieutenancy. But there her understanding of his time away from her ended, and she wanted to forget about it.

She heard the captain preparing to leave, and she went out and shook hands with him and asked him to come again soon. He looked at her curiously, with neither approval nor dislike. She had never seen such a cool, hard expression, but he smiled and held her hand for a moment.

"Don't worry," he said. "Everything's going to be fine."

"Oh, I'm not worried."

"I mean, you'll like Texas. It's not like this, and I guess it's hard for a woman to move from a city when she's used to it. But it's a fine house."

"Oh," she said. She dropped his hand and looked at George.

GEORGE was smiling. He clapped the captain on his shoulder and said he'd see him at lunch, and the captain said that was fine and nodded to her and went out. She waited for George to say something, but he crossed the room and opened the cigarette box and held it to her. She shook her head. She watched him light his cigarette.

"Well?" he said.

"He's very attractive, isn't he?"

"Oh, sure. I knew you'd like him."

"Was he a good officer?"

"The best. He's a good guy all around. And he knows ranching."

She saw that he was enthusiastic and wanted to talk about it at length, and she was tired. She didn't want to hear it now when she was so tired and confused. She would hold her peace and see what evolved.

"Look, this isn't just an idea, Cathy. I can make a go of it. I wouldn't drag you into anything that would fold over our ears and leave us high and dry. This is a cinch."

"Hugh Campbell thought it was a cinch when he took up fox farming and dragged Madge away from here. Now he can't get back in again. But, darling, I'm tired, and I don't want to talk about it now."

"But I've been trying to talk to you about this for a long time, Cathy. You would never listen. You seemed to think it was a crazy idea I'd soon forget—like trick photography or any of those hobbies I had before the war. It's not. I've been thinking about it since we were in Africa, like the captain said. I have a real need to try this thing."

She could see herself in the mirrored wall. She looked young and innocent with her hair like that. She bent down and turned off the table lamp. "Let's not talk now, darling."

He said something under his breath.

"Please," she said softly, "don't be mean to me. I want to believe it will be all right, only—only, maybe I'm afraid. That's it. Darling, I didn't go through all the fighting part. I didn't learn how to be brave and simply go along on enough food and water and sleep. I've got to have other things to keep me together—to make me brave."

He was not listening.

The rest of the week he did not mention the ranch. He was very busy, and twice he called to say he would be out for dinner. On one of these nights she worked late in her own office on a new fabric design.

On Sunday he got up early and went out without saying where he would be. She had breakfast in bed and wrote her mother and talked on the telephone. She felt happy and certain that the worst part of this would be over soon. Everyone said she had a fine marriage, and she knew this was so because everything was measured and defined. They were city people. George had a good business. She had interesting work. They knew charming people. They loved each other. That was partly why the Texas thing frightened her. Everything would change then: her whole life, George's work, her work, their friends; nothing would be measured or defined. George said she sang songs of doubt. Perhaps that was true, but it might also be wise in this case.

That evening George was more quiet than usual, but she said nothing about the ranch. She was carefully turning the pages of a fashion magazine, not reading or truly seeing the pictures, but holding the corners of the page tightly so that the magazine would not slip against her satin house coat. She had a sudden, rising feeling of panic as if a voice said to her, Cathy, it's over now. Sing your little songs of doubt; it's over between you and George if you continue opposing him either silently or in words.

"What?" she said.

"I said I'm leaving for Texas Wednesday." He slouched in his big chair. It was one of those times when he had his Army manner, a voice full of certainty, his mouth set, the strange way of looking at her that made her uneasy.

"I see."

HE leaned forward, coming into the mirror's scope. "I want to go, Cathy. I need to go. And it's no surprise to you."

"I know," she said. The vision of herself moved, trembled, sank into stillness in the mirror. "Still, I kept hoping you would change your mind."

"No."

"I guess we've talked it out then, haven't we?"

"No. I want you to come, Cathy. There's no reason why we can't be as happy there as we are here. We'll be together. Only it'll be different and new, and I think we can make a go of it, don't you?"

She was thinking of poor Madge Campbell living up there in a trailer in Darien. She couldn't answer him. She did not believe there was a chance for them if they changed the smallest part of their life together.

"You think I can't make a go of it, don't you?"

"George, I didn't say that."

"But you're thinking it."

"I don't know." She looked at him. "George, you're good in your own field. That's something you know very well. Now you've got an idea you want to change everything—just like that. You'll put up the money, and the captain will advise you, be your partner. It isn't as if you knew how good he is in business. You don't know."

"I know him better than I know anyone. Can't you understand that? I believe that anything he'd touch would be all right. No matter what it was."

"I want to think so. I want to believe that this will work out well for you—but I can't believe it."

"I see."

"You've never raised anything. Look at the geraniums. You've never even raised a dog, let alone all that cattle."

"The geraniums'll be fine."

"Oh, George!" She was miserable.

"It's all right, Cathy. If you think this way, there's nothing I can do about it."

He went into his dressing room. She could hear him drag out his suitcase. After a moment, she went in to help him pack. There was nothing else to say. She would wait. When everything fell through, when it was all over, she would be here waiting for him. He had begun to talk of money. He said he had sold the factory and left half the money in the bank in her name. He said she had nothing to worry about.

"It's your money, and you might need it. You should take it, darling."

He shook his head. "I've got enough. Besides, I don't want it to look easy to me. I want to have some worries to work out for myself." He kissed her on the cheek and then on her mouth. "Cathy," he said, "you're a sweet girl, but you sing too many songs of doubt."

Even after he left her, she could not bring herself to say it was true.

On Monday she received a note from him telling her where to reach him. He said he was leaving early Wednesday morning for Chicago. After that, she could reach him through Tim Harlan, their lawyer. She smiled over the air of formality in his note. She thought, It's as if he doesn't expect to see me again. Her hand tightened on the note.

"Maybe it's true. Maybe I'll never see him again, and it will be as if he was lost in

Marriage Hour

By Catherine Haydon Jacobs

This is the hour when, staid and motionless,
The future waits before the present; when
The eager past in a gay party dress
Skips cautiously across the room again.
Here is the sound of organ, lute and lyre;
The touch of velvet, satin and brocade;
And here is blue, and red, and golden fire
Glancing upon a fluted colonnade.

This is the hour when Time, bereft of scythe,
Stands patiently upon a mountain peak,
His arms uplifted, tall and strangely lithe,
As though the word he were about to speak
Would end forever his prophetic part,
And Time would be a stranger to the heart.

Clara Dudley says:

"Here's a beauty treatment every home can afford!"

Mrs. Helen B. Reinhart
LARCHMONT, NEW YORK

"I agree with Clara Dudley that there is nothing as important to the enjoyment of a home as the quiet elegance of fine rugs and carpet. As the war continued to make floor coverings scarce, I was glad that we had done over our home with Alexander Smith Rugs. It was one of the most satisfying purchases we have ever made."

Let's give our homes the repose that comes when the floors of every room are covered with soft, soundless rugs, in the most enchanting colors we can find. All of us know that rugs are basic in home comfort and beauty, but too few of us ever take time to figure out how reasonably we can own them.

It's fun to plan this quiet elegance for each room in your home. And it's a real thrill to discover that you can actually afford to cover every floor with Alexander Smith Rugs. You can buy them on a budget basis, just as you buy a car.

Enjoy a hall that gives a gracious welcome; stairs that take you up in quiet dignity. And never again that frigid experience of stepping on a cold, bare bedroom floor.

the war." She said this aloud, but her words sounded melodramatic and hollow, not worth listening to.

That evening she worked until nine and walked to the apartment. The night was clear and warm. While she was eating at a small French restaurant, she thought of the geraniums. She wondered if he watered them every day and if she ought to feed them some kind of minerals, but then she remembered that they were supposed to grow almost without help, wild and uncultivated. The idea of growing geraniums was strangely touching. She thought she was going to cry there in the restaurant, and she had to pay her check quickly and get out. Once in the street, she began to run toward the apartment.

As soon as she opened the door, she smelled the fruity, dry, faint odor of the geraniums. She went at once to his dressing room. He had set the plants carefully on the outer ledge and left a note to the maid to water them each morning and to bring them inside at the least hint of cold. She opened the window and touched the hard, dark bud that was ready to break open. Now the stalk of the flower had thickened and was already green. She could hardly believe that these were the same slips she had looked at a short time ago.

"Oh," she said. She knelt down and put her arm on the window sill. "Oh—they did grow. I was certain they wouldn't, but they grew just the same, almost by themselves, and he knew it—he knew they would grow."

She was crying very hard, quietly but deep inside herself. She had not cried since that day he went overseas. She reached out and brought in the tin tray and the pots and put them on the floor and looked at each flower. They were really not so ugly, but quite wonderful in their own sturdy way. Very soon now the buds would open and they would look like other geraniums. She felt like laughing about it.

She blew her nose hard. He had left them there on purpose, she knew. He believed they would grow, and they had grown. She hadn't believed any of it because she was timid and fearful and unbelieving, and so she had been too much involved in other things to believe the ranch, the adobe house, the thin girl in her wash dress, the captain and the cattle were something that could hold him and turn out right for him. But he had believed it enough to sell the factory and to leave her and everything he had once known so well. She closed her eyes for a moment. She could not bear to open them and see the plants there and the familiar room and then to know he was gone for good.

She knew what she had to do. "Yes," she said aloud. "It's all going to be new to him, and he ought to have something or someone from here."

She washed her face with cold water. Then she dialed the hotel where she knew the captain stayed. He answered the telephone, and when she asked for George his voice was suddenly friendly as if he knew too.

"George," she said, "I thought you'd like to know—the geraniums ——"

"Oh," he said, "you ought to water them once a day, Cathy."

"No—darling, they came out nicely. I mean, today when I came home, they were already buds, so I imagine tomorrow, when the sun comes out, they'll look fine."

"Fine," he said. He waited.

"Oh, George, George—I want to go with you if you want me to go with you."

"But, Cathy, you said—you have your work and then this cattle business is pretty risky, and you know how that country is. There's no one for miles except the captain's wife, and maybe ——"

"Oh, darling—don't talk like that. Why, you can grow anything. I know you can do it."

"Don't go anywhere," he said quickly, stammering in his excitement. "Stay right there. I'm coming over on the double. Don't move, Cathy."

She laughed and hung up the receiver and went back to his dressing room. Carefully she picked up the Mexican tin tray with the

She half closed the window. ## THE REVOLT AGAINST PAGANISM

in our public schools. The solution of that problem, so that our youth shall not grow up calling themselves educated when they are almost totally illiterate concerning man's most creative faiths and philosophies, is going to be a long, hard haul. But, in the meantime, we have a right to insist that if our schools may not teach religion, they may not inculcate irreligion either.

I am a liberal; I am not pleading for sectarianism or conventional orthodoxy, or anything of that sort.

What I want most of all is that Roman Catholics, Jews and Protestants should prepare together some book or books by means of which the best elements in the spiritual heritage of our race can be presented in our schools, objectively and without offense, as a matter of information.

Meanwhile, however, I am fed up with a familiar type of course in some of our institutions, where religion may not be taught but where by innuendo and clever sniping irreligion is taught. The Jewish prophets, Christ and the creative seers of our spiritual tradition might as well never have existed, while Freud, for example, not simply as a great pioneer in psychiatry but as an atheistic materialist, is presented at length as though he were infallible.

The separation of church and state is a fundamental principle of American democracy, but we are allowing it to mean what the fathers of the republic never dreamed it would mean: that youth, in our public institutions of learning, may be taught the denials of great faiths but not the affirmations of them. Our postwar world cannot be reconstructed on the basis of any negative, futilitarian philosophy. We desperately need great faiths about life, issuing in great ethical standards for life.

A few years ago one of the most vocal atheists in this country wrote that religion was getting feebler and feebler, and that the feebler it got the better the world became. He has been abundantly answered, I should suppose, not so much by arguments as by appalling facts.

Nazism did scrap the whole Jewish-Christian faith and ethic—that is the very essence of what it did—and since man is incurably religious it substituted an alternative faith, for which it asked uttermost devotion and by which the best spiritual values of our race were discarded. Moreover, in wide areas of our own personal and social life in this country, those basic ideas about God and man that have given human personality dignity and worth have been commonly crowded out, denied and surrendered. Today this revolt against Christ has brought us face to face with anti-Christ, and to save ourselves and our children we must revolt against that.

We face a paganism ascendant, downright anti-Christianity running the world, with no hope for us or our children save in the recovery of spiritual values. In the last analysis this is an individual matter. The emergence in our time of institutions like the Gallup Poll is no accident. We want to know what the people are thinking—not big people, but little people, average people, for in the long run everything depends on that. The hope of the world now lies in plain men and women, aroused by mankind's catastrophe, in revolt against paganism.

CONVERSION IN CONNECTICUT

By Richard Pratt

Architectural Editor of the Journal

WITHOUT any enlarging—in fact, with some reduction in size—the livability of this house has been doubled. By closely comparing the before-and-after plans and pictures, you will see, for instance, how a woodshed wing with an empty loft above can become a two-car garage, a downstairs bedroom and bath and son's upstairs apartment. You will see that a small kitchen and a windowless pantry are now a large light kitchen-laundry combination. Too much weakening porch, as is often the case, darkened too many rooms. Removing most of it not only lightened indoors but brightened up the whole outside. Notice how bringing the front door to the new entrance side and changing the stairs have done away with passing through one room to get to another. You will see how it is possible for a big house with only one bathroom to be amply provided on both floors without resorting to miracles.

Like many other old houses that are worth remodeling, the original character of this one was worth preserving. So the outside changes are largely repairs and refinements: new siding, new shingles, new trim and fresh paint. Too much emphasis can be laid and too much money spent on exterior changes that have mainly to do with looks, when the most effective improvements to appearance can be simply cleaning up and reconditioning. The real place for improvement is inside, where you live, remembering that modernizing the floor plan is just as important for your future convenience as the modernizing of the equipment.

What was the back is now the entrance side, the woodshed now the garage

Diary of Domesticity

By Gladys Taber

THE New England countryside is deep in winter. The wind blows wild and dark up the hill and batters the house. The great maples lose any branches that are dying; they crash down in the night and start the cockers barking like mad. Some days the snow drifts over the fence tops, and then the wind comes again and bare ground shows.

Our forefathers were sturdy men and wise to weather; they knew how to build for this winter wind. The house is low toward the north, the roof slants steeply. The barns faced the wind, too, and the cattle came in in the lee of the building.

All down the valley the little white houses are snugged down in February, and many of them have close-packed branches of evergreens banked around the foundation.

I like to go across the road to the neighbor's barn at dusk and stand inside where the cows are being milked. The air is steamy and warm from the heat of the cows, and smells of fresh milk and sweet hay. As George milks, the sound of the milk falling in the clean pails is a pleasant sound. There are always waiting kittens, and the big dog wags his way into the warmth. The kittens get a dish of warm milk and their little tongues lap so delicately as they drink.

The cows stand quietly, turning their heads to look at me with mild surprise. I always wonder what cows think about. They seem content, but perhaps they, too, have yearnings for a life of ranging the woods, free and unmilked and leading their own lives!

One of my favorite legends is the story of Europa and the beautiful milk-white bull, who was Zeus in disguise, who bore the beautiful maiden away over the blue sea. It is a story filled with enchantment, with the singing light of the gold sun, the meadow sprinkled with blue and white flowers, the sea sparkling on a dreamy shore and the young girl with her arms filled with blossoms. No wonder the god loved her. The white bull was suddenly beside her and she probably dropped the flowers, half afraid and half wondering—I'm sure his hoofs and horns were silver—and then she wreathed the horns in garlands of blue and gold and rode away to immortality. The world was innocent and young when the gods came down and dwelt with mortals whenever they were bored with Olympus!

We need to keep the old legends alive in our matter-of-fact world. This month has its own legend, the tale of St. Valentine. I hope we always celebrate Valentine's Day. The making of valentines was a serious business when I was growing up. Gilt and silver paper, red hearts, lacy paper frills, blue ribbons and little doves to paste on the finished product—we loved them all. I usually pasted my doves on upside down, but I thought they were elegant. Does anyone ever forget the excitement of that large valentine signed in masculine scrawl, GUESS WHO?

It had its hazards too. There was always a girl who got more valentines than anyone else. And a boy who only got a few funny ones. My mother had them in mind when she arranged for us to have extras. It was possible to increase some girl's quota in a hurry or add a few for the boy.

Later on, when we were older, there was the Valentine's Day when the only boy in the world produced a package from his pocket with a present in it. Really better than Christmas, for everyone exchanged gifts for Christmas, but a real valentine, not just candy—that was something. Oh, enchanted winter moon shining down on two bent heads, on mittened hands! The paper crackled, the ribbon was folded away, and there it was, the little locket set with chips of what might be diamonds, or the silver ring with the matrix stone. Whoever forgets first love and the first real valentine?

We never have time to be bored in the country in February. There are walks to shovel to the barn and chicken house, animals to feed and water, wood to bring in, the car dug out of the last drift of snow, the water tank balanced. And the water heater for the hens is always going out and being worked over. The eggs have to be gathered practically while they are laid, or they freeze solid as stones.

Melody and Hildegarde love to play hide and seek in the house on a winter afternoon. They skid around on the rugs, fall on each other, dive under the sofa, peer out, chase madly. Esmé and Tigger sometimes join in, on an upper level. Esmé really likes to play with the puppies as long as she is well away before they rush her.

Melody and Hildegarde and Silver have never grown up. Being still the youngest ones, they have stayed puppyish. We are making desultory attempts at training them. At the table they sit in a circle of three fixing their eyes on every mouthful anyone takes. When you give them something, saying firmly "Hup," they hup so hard the floor boards creak. Hildegarde feels if she keeps hupped she will get constant titbits. She is quite right. Being a weak-minded family with regard to our cockers and cats, we have been known to sneak out and eat a slice of cold roast beef behind closed doors rather than face their pleading eyes.

This is a good time of the year for parties. Friendship glows brightly when the fire burns clear and comfortable on the wide hearth.

We decided last week to have a big party and ask twice as many people as the house will hold. After much thought, we planned a come-and-go party, serving a buffet dinner from 5:30 to 8:30.

Jill said, "But they'll all come at once and stay the whole night."

I felt optimistic about the ones with young children to get to bed. "We ought to make it plain it is a special kind of supper," I said. "Why don't we call it a hunt dinner?"

"What are we hunting for?" asked Jill in astonishment.

"Well, we'll just call it open house," I said, giving up my flight of fancy.

"If they all come at once, it will be open house all right," prophesied Jill. "The walls will fall outward."

"And besides," added Bob, "it will probably snow."

There is a hazard about a party in February, but it is well worth facing. If a bad blizzard comes, the poles may go down, or the wires break, and the house be plunged into darkness. Often we have had the chicken roasting, the pie nearly done, the guests plowing to the door, just as the current went off. It is an excellent lesson in the helplessness of too-civilized people. For nothing is deader than a dead electric stove. Meanwhile, the electric stoker on the furnace stops, too, and the water pump sits idly on its belt so there will be no water in half an hour. By now the phone is as useful as an Egyptian mummy and the nervous members of the family begin to wring their hands and say, "The freezer will thaw! All the food will spoil!"

Winter. But we build up the fire in the old faithful range and add great logs to the fireplaces, and light the candles, and carry in water from the unelectric neighbor's spring. Some of our gayest parties have been given at such a time, when the guests help themselves in the glow of the tall ivory candles to the tender sizzling chicken (which did get done on the range) and toast rolls over the open fire. The radio and phonograph being voiceless, the company can sing. And tell favorite stories.

Even a waffle breakfast can be managed. Though I really felt qualms when I was trying to do waffles for a brace of lanky hungry Army lieutenants on the electric waffle iron and the current blanked out. One waffle glued itself to the grids with a death grip and the boys came rolling out with empty plates and expectant smiles.

"Boy, it's nice and peaceful here," they said.

Hastily I carried the remains of the batter to the old faithful wood range and said, "How about pancakes for a change?"

Spring is on the way! The seed catalogues are a sure sign. We pore over the brilliant flowers that we never can raise in New England, decide on vegetable seeds. Jill's lists are all over the house. "Edible podded, plant twice as many," she writes. "Remember the squash. Same carrots. Need eggplant."

Now, like all passionate gardeners, we have forgotten how hard it is to weed and hoe and weed and hoe and spray. In our minds the garden stretches like a picture in the catalogue and we stand and admire it, leaning idly on a hoe. This year everything will produce like mad, Jill thinks, and without any struggle on our part. We keep reading about gardens that flourish with no plowing and no working, and they sound highly plausible until we wonder what happens to the annual crop of boulders, gravel, bottle tops and old screens our garden produces so thickly.

When prosperity comes, do not use all of it. —CHINESE.

This is the time to count over the canned things and the freezer packages, too, and estimate how much the family really needs by way of crops and plan to plant just that much and no more.

The storage bins and the fruit cellar and the shelves should be gone over thoroughly this month while you are in the house on a dark blizzardy day. And if you sort the jars by size and pack them in dozen lots, you will save hours of time during those hot August days when you have too much to do anyway.

When you are really working toward spring, you know how short February is.

The earth begins to dream of spring too. Under the brook ice, the water is flowing. The long shadows on the pasture snow are violet where soon the real first violets will spread their purple. What a wondrous world we have, indeed, with the roll of the seasons, the eternal return of spring and summer.

"Heigh-ho," says Honey, stretching golden paws to the fire, "winter is all very well, as long as spring is on the way."

Hey! What's the Biggs idea?

IT was just a small idea. A little act of wifely thoughtfulness on the part of Mrs. J. E. Biggs of Oklahoma City.

But it resulted in her making a discovery she'll be thankful for all her life!

It seems that Mister Biggs, true to his name, is a plus-six-footer. So Mrs. Biggs had an extra-long mattress made to fit him. And then, of course, she had to buy extra-size sheets to fit the mattress. Well, to quote her letter:

"That's how I discovered beautiful, snowy-white Pequots. There were other sheets aplenty, but I chose Pequots, because they looked so lovely."

Mister Biggs was very pleased, as what six-foot husband wouldn't be. And that made the Missus happy too. But imagine her extra and special delight, she writes:

"...when I discovered how beautifully those Pequot sheets wore! First, for many years on the grown-ups' bed. Then cut down for the children's cribs, still smooth and white and perky."

Only recently, Mrs. Biggs cut the remnants into soft bandages for the family First Aid box. Is it any wonder the Biggs family is sold on Pequots?

This is one more "from life" example of why Pequots have so long been America's favorite sheets. If your store should be short, a new supply will surely be along soon. So keep asking for Pequots!

COLLECTORS' CHOICE

By Henrietta Murdock

Interior Decoration Editor of the Journal

China pets are collectors' favorites. The best old ones are Victorian and English, usually Staffordshire or Chelsea. In this grouping are some modern American pottery animals—tomorrow's heirlooms. The best pieces are sharply modeled, well posed and have high glazes.

PHOTOS BY HAROLD FOWLER

Fans were made for a century and a half, the old ones hand-painted and carved by leading artists of the day. You will find them at auctions, in antique and thrift shops. Any pretty fan is worth collecting—all are becoming rare. Porcelain boxes are fairly expensive, delicate, choice.

THESE days you have to collect or be classed as a period piece yourself. Everybody seems to be joyously hunting for china pets or glass hats, mechanical banks, old valentines or sandalwood. The quest is the real fun. Be sure to collect something not too hard to find, but scarce enough to make your collecting an adventure.

Good items are small Victorian glass novelties such as shoes, hats or bottles, old brass bells, hand-decorated fans, carved boxes, porcelain birds, odd pitchers, ship miniatures, figurines, Staffordshire horses or hounds, snuffboxes and wood carving. Additional items worth collecting are cups and saucers, Victorian mother-of-pearl and lacquer, Bristol ware, fine bottles, inlaid boxes, old silver spoons, signets and pewter.

Supercollectors narrow the field by specializing—acquiring only dogs of one variety, birds from a single pottery, milkmaid and shepherd figurines exclusively, old Bohemian red glass, or miniature Chelsea pitchers; in short, they look for specimens of the one kind of article they are accumulating.

Beginners often make the mistake of collecting for varieties only, without regard to the rareness of the specimen, its charm or historical interest. Keeping your collection choice and authentic is part of the fun, and of course the index of its value.

Here are a few tips: If you already own a treasure which you enjoy, make it the basis of your collection and build around it. Not all the best items are old; porcelain birds, for instance, are new and are being superbly modeled and colored.

A choice selection of today's treasures will be priceless in your grandchildren's time. If you get a good book dealing with your particular hobby, you will be able to discuss it more intelligently. Most people love the romance of collecting old things, and it is a pastime you can pursue anyplace you happen to live.

Porcelain figurines were favorite ornaments during the past century. Mostly French or English, subjects are usually romantic; best ones show color and detail. Favorite subjects are lover-and-maid, girl-and-boy pairs, children with pets.

Victorian shoes are fun to collect and should be displayed on shallow shelves. Best ones are porcelain with handmade flowers; glass ones were intended for match and toothpick holders. All countries made miniature shoes, in porcelain, silver, glass, pewter, and even gold with jewels. Collectors look for variety.

These are the "teenies" arranged on a tiny tier table in scale with their size. All small collections displayed in a room should be made to look precious and given importance by being exhibited in a special case or on shallow shelves.

Of all collectors' items, bells come near to being top favorites. Early American bells, Swiss, Chinese or Tibetan, Persian, Egyptian and Javanese all belong in a good collection. Fine tone is as desirable as unique shape. Each individual bell can be identified with the exact spot in the world from which it came.

REPORT To the Housewife

BY JUDY BARRY

THE Workshop's ear is pressed close to the ground these days and its nose for news is sniffing busily. There's so much that's noteworthy and newsworthy in the world of worksaving ideas and equipment! Time, to be sure, has not had a chance to mellow many of them, nor custom to bring to light possible quirks in performance. But at any rate things are happening—answers to age-old problems and wishes of homemakers are being worked out. We hasten to pass the cream of what we see and hear along for your consideration.

Self-Service Community Laundry

Self-service laundries, where homemakers can do their own clothes with the latest equipment in model surroundings, are now in operation and more are to come. Here's how they work. The housewife drives her car into the parking lot adjacent to the laundry, takes her bundle of clothes in and has it weighed, pays a modest fee which entitles her to the use of as many automatic washing machines as she will need to complete her job at one time. (She has previously made an appointment, so there's no waiting.) Then, having loaded the machine, put in soap which is furnished without charge, and set the machine's dials, she can go into the comfortable lounge to read, knit or chat while the automatic machine carries on with washing, rinsing and damp drying. Water is kept at the proper temperature and rain-water softness by an automatic device. A trained laundry expert supervises all operations and gives advice to neophyte washers. As soon as they are available, automatic driers, as well as electric ironers, will be installed, while future plans call for sun lamps, air conditioning and germicidal lamps!

Easygoing Awnings

Good looking, good sense, too, are new lightweight awnings of aluminum, from which you ought to expect a lifetime of service. These can be operated from inside the house so easily that the touch of a couple of finger tips does it—they roll up in the manner of old-fashioned rolltop desks. Some sizes are already on the market, au naturel, or with a finish of baked enamel in colors to harmonize with your house. Dust and dirt wash off easily with soap and water.

Showerproof "Chill Chaser" Lamps

Newest infrared heat-ray lamps are constructed of special ruby-red glass so rugged it can toss off even a shower of ice water without cracking. These radiant heat lamps should be well suited for warming the backs of bath-tub sitters, or for keeping sick people, who must be bathed in bed, comfortable. They're planned, too, for drying small laundered articles or shampooed hair quickly.

Sunshade Screens

Another new window development is aluminum screening, which under a magnifying glass looks like an opened Venetian blind. Thus, it lets in light and air, yet helps to exclude direct rays of the sun. Its designers expect that this innovation will keep sunny rooms at least 10 per cent cooler.

How Did You Sleep Last Night?

Read this and weep, if you were chilly! Research engineers have developed a new electrically heated mattress which should be a real boon to elderly people—or, for that matter, anyone who "sleeps cold." Placed on top of a regular mattress, this soothing warmer-upper, which has a new type of inner-spring construction, is said to be especially valuable to sufferers from arthritis or nervous disorders. It will use approximately 65 watts of electricity, about the equivalent of an average light bulb.

Outside-in Storm Windows

Just appearing in a few stores is a new lightweight aluminum frame, into which winter storm panes or summer screens are slipped in a jiffy, so that seasonal changeovers can be made from inside the house, safely and easily. The upper pane slides down into the lower frame for removal. Panes or screens click into place in the rustproof frame without benefit of screws or hooks. When panes need washing, they're just slipped out of the frame entirely, a job which should take even a bantamweight housewife no more than a few seconds, its makers claim.

People Who Live in Glass Houses

They may now throw stones, if they like, for we've seen new and fascinating furniture made entirely of glass which, its designer assures us, won't break or shatter. To prove it, he kicked a smart glass fire screen hard, banged violently on a beautiful all-glass dining table. There are decorative full-length window panels of cloudy sculptured glass, to screen out an unpleasant view, yet allow soft light to enter. There's a little round glass table whose smooth glass top, through which a classic design shows pleasantly, flips over to become an hors-d'oeuvre dish. The glass is sculptured so the design has this functional value. One of the enticing new things is a coffee table whose legs and framework, finished in red lacquer, support a glass "showcase" top to display a collection of miniatures, antique jewelry, coins or decorations. Such personal treasures look as precious as they are, seen through the clear glass, arrayed on the mirror floor of the table top. Most glass furniture seems to be for orchidaceous budgets, but it's lovely!

Feather Fabrics

From the leftover feathers of erstwhile fryers and broilers, a downy fabric, soft to touch as Angora, is now being made. The feathers are mixed with a "binder" of wool or cotton before being spun into yarn, emerge as a fabric that stays fluffy and won't shrink in laundering. What chickens wouldn't like to be reincarnated as a gay evening sweater?

Miniature Washing Machines

Answer to apartment dwellers' prayers are new portable, pint-size but very efficient washing machines. There is one about as wide across as a hatbox, 13 inches—20 inches tall without its wringer. It has a water capacity of 2½ gallons, will wash and rinse 2 pounds of clothing (1 sheet and 1 pillowcase, or 22 diapers) at a time. Another, even smaller, is 9 inches square, 18 inches long, weighs only 15 pounds, could be a useful traveling companion! Both are designed to handle fine lingerie or delicate baby clothes gently—to be used in kitchenettes or baths and stored under a sink or in a closet.

A Quarter's Worth of Safety

A new one-watt fluorescent lamp, about the size of a quarter, is expected to prevent many accidents in that most hazardous place, the home. Since this should burn a month for two and a half cents' worth of electricity, it will be possible to keep it lighted all day and night on such trouble spots as the cellar stairs, or all evening in the kitchen to guide midnight icebox raiders, to mark bedposts, angular corners, sudden steps, or serve as a night light in the children's room. Tests have proved that it will burn for a full year, working day and night. The bulbs, giving a soft green or white light, may be screwed directly into an ordinary light socket, or may be equipped with a bi-prong base to plug into a baseboard outlet.

"Oops, Sorry!"

Soon, when an embarrassed guest says that, you may really mean the "it doesn't matter a bit"—which you now murmur just to be kindly. That is, if you acquire some of the new stainproof table linens from which, it is promised, a whisk of damp cloth will erase even tomato-juice stains. Treatment with plastic, no more than a whisper's thickness, makes this possible, yet still allows the textured look of the cloth to be unimpaired. It seems that only the experts can tell which side has been treated.

Pick a Peck o' Plastics

Charming plasticized lamp shades, made of fragile lace, bright chintz, or even burlap, if you like, are just appearing. Although these are extremely light, they're so strong that no framework is needed, and they're easily cleaned with a damp cloth. . . . New plastic clotheslines are waterproof, rustproof, cleanable with soap and water or cleaning fluids. What's more, they're done in forest-green camouflage so the neighbors won't be likely to notice if you leave them up over Sunday!

. . . To the Aid of the Party!

At last, at last, there may be an ice-cube maker, capable of dropping 40 ice cubes into your outstretched glasses in 25 seconds, and refreezing another batch of cubes in 30 minutes! Up to now, alas, we haven't even seen its picture, but we are assured that it's nearly ready for the market.

FUNNYFACE

violets. She wore a little fur cap, so tiny that it showed off her hair.

"So sorry I'm late," she cooed. She waved vaguely at the pianist. "Hello, Peter. Let's get going. Have you their music?"

Joan sped to the back of the hall and changed while the dark girl whispered something to the pianist and he broke into a popular tune. Sandra watched the girl for a moment and, before there was even time for her to show what she could do, stopped her with an imperious gesture.

"Thank you; next one, please."

The process was repeated with the auburn beauty. A rising tide of indignation simmered inside Joan. How could this silly blonde judge anyone's work if she were only allowed to sing two bars and not allowed to dance at all. Of course, she oughtn't to care. But she'd like to teach this stuck-up blonde a lesson. And the young man at the piano was a dear. It was a shame that he should be eating out his heart for such a girl. Because no matter how beautiful she was, she was badly mannered.

Joan moved over to the piano. "I'll dance first just to vary the monotony," she whispered. "Aren't you glad I didn't take that bet of yours?"

"We're not through yet."

The young man snapped into the tune. He played exceptionally well and Joan's little flying feet tapped out a fast rhythm. He shifted a little in his chair so that he could watch her. So quick and light she was, her brown curls dancing in sympathy, a smile on her mouth—not the trained smile of the chorus girl, but a smile that came from inside.

Joan could see the blonde watching her intently. She had been going a whole two minutes before the other got up and spoke.

"Won't you be out of breath for singing?"

"Oh." Joan stopped short and grinned in friendly fashion. "I didn't think you'd let me get as far as singing," she said frankly.

There was no answering smile on Sandra's face. "I'd like you to sing now, please."

Joan stepped across to the piano again. "She's crackers," she whispered.

"What about my bet now?"

She propped a tattered bit of music in front of him. "I'll fail on this."

"Take your time."

She wondered that he presumed to keep his employer waiting. "Play a large piece of introduction."

"Right." He glanced at the music and a moment later she was surprised to hear a wealth of variations on the theme, an introduction invented on the spur of the moment, an introduction that gave her ample time to get back her breath and was long enough for the two other young ladies to get themselves indignantly out of the room.

Joan sang, true and clear and sweet, a small voice well trained and unspoiled by any premature efforts. Three minutes later it was all decided.

"That's all right," said Sandra, and she had suddenly become more human. "I expect Mr. Anger told you the terms. We'll be four weeks on tour and we've two days to rehearse your stuff."

"Two days!" It didn't seem long enough.

"Oh, don't worry. You won't have much to do. It's the management's idea that we need a third. It's just window dressing, really."

"But—but where's your partner?"

"Peter—didn't you meet? Peter writes the music, you know. Peter Murray—Joan Hutton. I'm sure we'll all get on beautifully together. Everyone says I'm easy to work with, don't they, Peter darling?"

He looked up at her lazily. "Do they?"

She dropped a kiss on the top of his head. "Of course they do." She swung round for a moment to Joan. "He's an awful tease. Well, I'll change and we'll start work right away."

Joan watched Sandra out of earshot. "How did you know?" she asked the young man.

"I know more than people think," he said, smiling.

Joan looked thoughtfully after the lovely lady. Oh, I see. She said it to herself. Funnyface. No competition. My face is my fortune—only in a rather unusual way. She threw back her head and laughed a small gurgling sound of pure delight. "I never thought I'd live to get a good job just because I look like a nice hockey-playing schoolgirl."

"You're a dreadful child," he said severely. "You must never again say what you think. Where would we all be if we went round saying what we think?"

"It might be healthy."

He did not pay any attention. "And your face is a very good face. I like it." He tinkled a merry little tune on the piano. "It inspires me. Music for a young lady who isn't yet quite grown up." The little tune had now a tiny lilt of sadness. "That's her first love—her first heartbreak. Can you hear it, Joan?"

"Yes," she said breathlessly. "Go on."

The music swelled a little and steadied. "That's her last love," he said.

"Couldn't they be the same?" she entreated. "I've always thought that would be the best romance of all—to love once and for all time."

He struck a harsh note across the piano and let his hands fall in his lap. "You learned these notions on the hockey field."

"I wonder how one plays hockey."

"I haven't an idea," said the young man.

THERE was only one eddy of ill-feeling during the two days of rehearsal. And that was when Joan wanted to introduce a little comedy into her only solo verse. "But I could get a laugh—I know I could," she pleaded.

Sandra had looked at her very straight and said with deadly emphasis, "I'm sorry. I cannot allow you to vulgarize the act."

Joan was too surprised to manage a retort.

Whenever she was working in London, Joan lodged with Mrs. Merral, who had known mum and dad and all the tribe of brothers and sisters. Mrs. Merral sat on the bed and darned while Joan packed.

"I always hate to see you go, dearie. Such a kid as you seem and all."

Joan stopped folding her frock and looked gravely across at Mrs. Merral. "I know. But I'm not such a kid inside," she protested. She had felt these past two days queer spiritual shooting pains. "It's the way I look."

"Don't you be in a hurry. One's grown up for a very long time, Joan."

"But I feel different," she insisted. "You see, before, I was always in the chorus, with a lot of others, and no one saw me much, no matter how good or how bad I was. But now—even though I haven't much to do—I have to do it on my own."

Mrs. Merral rolled up the darned pair of stockings and sighed comfortably. "You find a nice young man, Joannie, and then y grow up fast enough." She chuckled. ' you find a husband, Joannie, and then y feel you're a hundred."

All very well, thought Joan, but ' young men"—whatever they were—d care about girls that lacked glamour. might like them all right as sisters, b was a beautiful woman —— Joan stoc long thinking about a beautiful woman Mrs. Merral had to nudge her to get packing finished.

The night they opened, Sandra was ability itself. "You mustn't feel nervo she said in the dressing room they sha "Peter and I will pull you through."

Joan did not, after the first few mome feel particularly nervous. She merely invisible. For it was obvious that no one eyes for any girl except Sandra. Her dan and singing were not outstanding, but t was no denying that she looked bre takingly lovely.

AFTERWARD Sandra crumpled up a l note that had been sent up to their dres room and announced that she had a su date. "An old friend. I do hope Peter — She stopped a moment and then went again. "How do you like Peter?" she asl

Joan suspended operations on her face fore she answered. She thought there m be a catch in the question. "He seems nice," she said cautiously.

"Poor Peter." The golden head w thoughtfully to one side and Sandra sig luxuriously. "So sweet and so clever. crazy about me. He gets so jealous, poor Of course someday we'll settle down, bu must have a little freedom first."

Joan roused herself from her reve "No—no. I'm all right. Thanks all same, I'd love the tea."

The dresser looked at her thoughtfu "You know, when you came in your outd things tonight I thought for a moment was one of them child prodigies. Now course I see you're a young lady."

Joan looked at her own reflection, and unsmiling face looked back at her. "Y I'm a young lady," she said thoughtfully

That evening she and Peter supped off and chips and coffee at a snack bar near theater. He put a brave face on his appointment. All he had said when he he that Sandra was gone was, "With some c who's crazy about her?"

"Yes. How did you know?"

"I told you once before. I know more t people think."

She slipped her arm consolingly inside "Never mind. There are all the tomorrow

But somehow during the days that lowed she found that it was harder harder to keep smiling. Joan had been w to find fun everywhere and enjoy everyth that life had to offer. But there was so thing wrong with this tour. From a pro sional point of view it was good money, g experience, but from a personal point of v it was good plain hell.

one man or another who was "just about her" he busied himself all day piano. He was writing a revue and he d with enormous patience.

e'll be very famous one day," said a lightly.

e third week they played one of the le towns. Sandra, after the Monday-ing band call, was for once at a loose nd had asked Peter to come walking e front. But he had refused. He wanted ish some tune that was bothering him, ne sat down at the piano in the empty er, pushed a pile of manuscript music e top, and settled to work.

an lingered, looking curiously at the bent over the keys, at the concentra-on the lean young face. "Why do you so hard, Peter?" she asked.

stopped playing and looked up at her, ng. For a moment his hands lay idle he looked out the distance. "I'll ou, Joan. I don't to spend my life ing in a fourth-act in punk towns our. I want to n, Joan. I want vrite tunes that y butcher's boy whistle. I want music played to audiences. And ething else ——"

Yes?"

e brought his to a level with own and looked her gravely. meday, Joan, I'll t to marry. To-I haven't any-g to offer a girl. I it to be able to my girl all the gs that women —sables and gar-nias and well-ched pearls ——" he didn't hear the . The vague little e in her heart in-sified. That was w one thought ut a woman like ndra. It didn't tter that he uldn't go walking h her on the front, ce what he was do-was working so at someday she ght have sables d gardenias and ll-matched pearls.

"For my part," said Joan with her old n, her heart gallant and her head high, "I all walk out of church under an arch of ckey sticks. Cheap and appropriate."

He laughed. "Listen, funnyface." He ran s fingers over the keys. "I've written a medy number. Will you try it?"

"Oh, Peter—may I?"

"You have a dream too?"

HE nodded. "I'd like to make people ugh. I think I could." She held the sheet music for a moment against her heart. There's money in that, too, Peter. When u went by in your Bentley I'd splash you ith my Rolls."

"We might have more fun in the same as," he said and struck a chord.

After that they worked every morning on e comedy number, and while they worked verything else was forgotten. These morn-gs were the only consolation in a world rown rather wretched. And there was only ne week more of the tour and then they ould go their separate ways. Joan would be ack in the chorus. All that she would know ould be from a paragraph someday in heatrical paper recording that Sandra Finert ooked very beautiful at her marriage to Peter Murray, the well-known composer. And that the bride went away in a sable coat.

It was during the last week of the tour that they learned that the great Mr. Temperley himself was booking for his A tour and that Mr. Anger had arranged to have an audition on the day they returned to town. He had phoned them the particulars and impressed on them that they must have new material.

Joan heard the news with mixed feelings. Perhaps it was better that she should get back where she belonged. "I—I don't know that I want to go," she said to Peter, in a small despairing voice.

"WHY, Joan, we couldn't do without you. What's the matter? Is it Sandra?"

"Yes," she said, but it wasn't the truth.

He took her hands comfortingly in his own. "You mustn't mind her," he said softly. "I know she's trying at times, but she doesn't mean it—she doesn't think ——"

Of course he would stand up for Sandra. Her wide brown eyes were hurt, her mouth drooped. The feel of his hands on hers was a sweet agony. It was better that she should go away and not see him ever again.

"I don't want to come," she repeated.

"Why, Joan!" He bent and studied her face, and his voice had a sharp note of anxiety. "Joan, dear, don't look like that."

"Like what?"

"As if—as if you'd suddenly grown up."

"Perhaps—I have."

He slipped an arm around her and drew her nearer. "You mustn't, funnyface," he said softly. "Not if you find the world so horrid when you see it with grown-up eyes. Smile for me, Joan."

She did as he told her, a small uncertain smile that widened courageously to a grin. "All right. I'll try."

"That's the stuff. I should think the great Temperley will send us all spinning out on our ears, but it's worth a try. It would mean a lot to us professionally."

The trouble was that to Joan, at least, it would also mean a lot personally. Rather more than she felt she could take.

They started in at once to rehearse. Peter drew out a bunch of songs that had been intended for the revue and they practiced new routines. All went peacefully till it came to the question of Joan's comedy number.

"It's disgusting," said Sandra. "If you put that in you'll kill the act."

Peter uttered a word of protest. "Really, Sandra, it's a very mild little song."

Sandra wouldn't argue. "It doesn't go in."

"But, Sandra, please." This was a matter on which Joan felt keenly. At last to have something real to do, to be able to put over Peter's number, to try if she were right in her belief that she could make people laugh.

"No."

"Don't you see, Sandra, it will make such a good contrast. I'm homely and perhaps funny, and you're beautiful and everything you do is graceful and don't you see ——"

Sandra was not to be caught by such a specious argument. "Nonsense," she said sharply. "It's unsuitable and that's all."

Afterward Joan managed to catch Peter alone for a moment. "I—I—know how you feel about Sandra, but can't ——"

The Cobra tone arm so completely revolutionizes all former methods of record reproduction that broadcasting studios all over America are using it. And only Zenith has it!

You have a new thrill awaiting you when you play your own records with the Cobra tone arm. You'll hear golden tones and overtones which you never knew were in the records. The Cobra not only brings them out, but at the same time miraculously erases all annoying surface noise, rattle and hum!

The Cobra is not only a new tone arm—it employs an entirely new principle of musical reproduction. It reproduces tones on a Radionic Wave—there are no old-fashioned crystals or magnets . . . no needles to change. The Cobra is extremely light and so perfectly balanced that it exerts only ⅔ of an ounce of pressure on the record—adding as much as 1000% to record life. Dropping—even scraping the arm across the record—does not harm either the Cobra or the record.

Another outstanding feature of the new Zenith radio-phonograph is the Silent-Speed Record Changer which changes records smoothly and quietly in 3½ seconds. There are no "gadgets" or complicated regulators to fuss with—and this changer plays 10 and 12 inch records intermixed, automatically!

30 YEARS OF "KNOW-HOW" AND LEADERSHIP IN RADIONICS EXCLUSIVEL

He did not let her finish. "Never waste time arguing. You'll do the number. Leave it to me."

Mrs. Merral welcomed Joan back to London with a lot of motherly solicitude. "Did you have a nice time, dearie? You look tired, love. I've got a nice hot supper for you. Tell me all about the tour."

Joan always told Mrs. Merral all about everything, but somehow this time the recital was rather halting and incomplete. Once or twice Mrs. Merral frowned anxiously as if not quite satisfied.

"You're not eating, dearie," she said as Joan's story drew to a faltering close. "You sure you're all right? You're sure nothing happened? That young piano fellow—he didn't get fresh with you or anything? You can tell me, dearie. If he was up to any tricks ——" The sentence was left menacingly unfinished.

Joan propped her elbows on the table and her chin in her hands. "No, he wasn't up to anything. He—he's going to marry Sandra Ainert; she's lovely."

Mrs. Merral sniffed. "Lovely is as lovely does," she said. "And you run off to bed. You're all wore out and you've got to make a big hit tomorrow."

"Oh, me." Joan got up and stood for a moment looking round the familiar overcrowded parlor. "I shall be back in the chorus."

"What's wrong with that?" demanded Mrs. Merral. "You looked a sight bonnier when you were working in the chorus."

"Think I'm showing my age?"

"That's just what I do think," said Mrs. Merral sharply. "And outgrown your strength, I shouldn't wonder. I'll get you some nice cod-liver oil tomorrow."

Joan did not sleep much that night in the familiar little bedroom that so often passed for home. Outgrown your strength. That was just about right. She didn't think she could stand another tour with weeks of seeing Peter every day. . . . Not that she was likely to get the offer. . . . How could anyone ever hope to be funny when one felt one was all carved up inside in little pieces? . . . She must go to sleep . . . she'd look a sight . . . she'd forget her routines. . . . Oh, Peter—Peter. She won't make you happy. I can't bear you to be unhappy, darling. . . . And then it all grew hazy and she slept.

JOAN came to the audition with the calm of despair. She was going to have her chance to show the great Mr. Temperley that she could be funny, and she felt about as funny as a corpse in the morgue.

The audition was at the Regina Palace, the old-fashioned music hall that the clever Mr. Temperley had revived and turned into a colossal money-maker.

Mr. Anger was there to meet them. "Good luck," he said mechanically. "Oh, by the way, Sandra, if you don't get this I've got a nice revue offer for you. They'll hold it open till tomorrow."

"Thanks," said Sandra indifferently. She had no doubt that the act would be booked.

He ran his eyes over her approvingly. "You'll be all right," he said. "Now buck up, the lot of you."

For a moment, in the wings, Peter held Joan's hand. "Good luck, funnyface," he whispered.

As the trio took the stage they knew that somewhere in the darkness at the back of the shrouded stalls sat the great Mr. Temperley himself. They were all weighted down with the importance of the occasion. For the tour would end in London. If they could get the booking, it might be the first step on the ladder that led to bright lights.

The moment came for Joan's two-minute sentimental solo, in which the others joined after the first verse. Joan stood ready, and then she realized that Peter was playing the intro music to her comedy number. The world whirled about her, then it settled back into place and she stepped forward.

The music got her. A little laugh welled up through her being, a little happiness. She forgot that the great Mr. Temperley was sitting in front, that the cleaners were brushing up and down the aisles, that Mr. Anger was watching with his critical dissatisfied expression, that Sandra was simmering with rage—for she was back again in the empty theater alone with Peter, singing his music so that one day he should have all his heart desired. And she put into the little song everything that she had ever learned, everything that she knew by instinct was a trick to catch a laugh, and something more—something she had learned unconsciously on tour: a touch of pathos which heightened the dramatic effect.

IT was a little song about a girl for whom everything always went wrong. Joan did not look like a child of the theater, standing there in her short dancing frock, her wide brown eyes so candid and appealing, her childlike face earnest as she told the story of her woes, her mop of brown curls shaking to emphasize some point, her sensitive smile wavering as she confided to the world a wealth of trouble that led from the loss of a safety pin to the loss of her young man.

The moment the song was over, Peter hurried the two girls into the next number, which was a hot-rhythm dance, and he rattled on madly to the end of the act, so that they took everything a shade faster than it had been rehearsed and Joan felt both breathless and reckless and somehow just a little insane.

They came to their final bow and peered down to see Mr. Anger in the stalls talking to what looked like a group of trapeze artists, men with too square shoulders and arm muscles that imperiled the seams of their suits.

"Oh, you three," he called up, preoccupied. "Mr. Temperley had to take a long-distance call. He saw the act through, though. He wants two of you. He'll be back to tell you in five minutes. Yes, only two. I'll see you later about the contracts." He turned his attention again to the group of strong men. "If you'll come into the office, gentlemen," he said, and led them away through a door marked "Private."

That, thought Joan, was that. After all, Sandra had been right. They didn't want comedy in a song-and-dance act, at least not her brand of comedy.

"I'm sorry, Peter," she said, gulping just a little. "I spoiled your song. Never mind, some real comedian will sing it someday."

"I never heard such nonsense." He was by her side now, his arm protectively around her slim waist. "You were grand. Wants two of us indeed. He gets all or nothing."

"What did you say?" Sandra's voice was sharp with anxiety.

"All or nothing," he repeated.

"Have you gone mad?"

"No. Cold sane and sober."

"And what about me?"

"You come in with us—or there's that revue offer."

"Are you seriously suggesting ——"

"I'm going to tell Temperley. He's taking all three or there's no act."

Sandra took a deep breath and then she addressed him as if he were a small and unreasonable child who did not quite understand the situation. "My dear Peter, listen. Temperley's paying, my pet, and he can say just what he'll have and what he won't have, so don't talk like a silly little boy. Joan was very naughty and obstinate, and really she's no one but herself to blame."

"You're quite right, Sandra," said Joan and she managed to grin, though it was a bit of an effort. "It was all my fault. I deserve it. I can get a chorus job. I'll be all right." The color came and went in her cheeks with the effort to keep her voice steady.

"Will someone listen to me for a change?" said Peter.

"Not if you're going to be tiresome, my pet."

"I am going to be tiresome," he said severely, "and I'm going to be quite final. Either Joan is in the act or I leave—with my songs. If Temperley doesn't like us, that's just too bad. Joan comes along—have you got that?"

For a moment Joan felt too bewildered to understand. It seemed as if the whole world had gone mad. Why should Peter talk like that? It didn't make sense. But it was delicious nonsense. The most delicious she had ever heard. It left her speechless.

"Have you taken leave of your senses, Peter?" Sandra was struggling for self-control. "You don't suppose I'm going to let you give up a good offer for some highfalutin idea ——"

"Sandra, who gave you permission to decide what I was to do? When did I cease to be a free agent? Now let me tell you something. I've given you your head. I haven't argued with you on this tour. Even when I disagreed—and that was most of the time—I didn't argue, because I was too busy. I let you have your head because most of the things didn't matter. But now we come up against something that does matter. This time I mean what I say."

"But Peter, I thought you ——"

"I know. You thought I was crazy about you. Sandra, my dear, you never really thought about it at all. You just assumed that I was crazy about you because that's what you're used to. Most men are crazy about you. In nine cases out of ten you'd have been right. I happened to be the tenth."

She took it in very quickly and she came back fighting mad. "All right, you don't give a hoot about me—but is that any reason for wrecking both our careers for a nitwit?"

It was the first time that Joan could catch her breath to intervene in the quarrel. "That's right, Peter," she said quickly. "You've been grand. And I'm grateful. I think you've been grander than anyone I've ever known. But Sandra is right. You've both got to go on and become famous. And someday I'll be ever so proud I knew you."

He swung round now and he put his finger gently over her mouth. "Shut up, funnyface," he said softly. "I haven't any career without you. Don't you know that? Whether you like it or not, our careers are one—we're going to ride in the same old bus. Please, funnyface, don't ever send me away ——"

"But Peter, darling, darling, Peter, you've got to go on and up and have your name in bright lights ——"

"Not without you, Joan."

Anyone would have thought that they were all alone, for her arms went shamelessly round his neck and he held her so close that she could hardly draw her breath.

And then there was a rustle in the back of the stalls and a voice—the great Mr. Temperley's voice—boomed across the empty theater. "Now then, don't stand there—snap into it—I want to see some of that stuff again."

There was a moment's hesitation on everyone's part. Joan moved discreetly aside and Sandra instinctively forward.

Mr. Temperley waved an impatient hand. "Not you, girl. Not you. Didn't Mr. Anger tell you? I want the funny one. There's money in laughs. Now let me have that comedy number again."

The Dark Wood A NEW SERIAL BY Christine Weston

STORIES BY ELIZABETH DUNN • JESSAMYN WEST • LUCIA ALZAMORA

LUCIA ALZAMORA (Prelude to Happiness) writes: "The only thing that ever happened to me which might be considered Really Fascinating is the fact that I was born in Peru and lived there for the first few years of my life. But my existence, if not bubbling over with high adventure, is pleasantly brimming with a husband and two surprisingly normal children. We winter in New York, with frequent ski trips to prove that we're not completely citified; and we summer on Cape Cod, where I can lie on the beach for all I'm worth. (That's not a major ambition; just a pet love!) My most blatant failing appears in my questionable capacity of autobiographer. In that meadow, I'm a speechless weed—as you can see!"

BAIRD HALL (Gold Rush) says: "I'm a woodworker, and the guys who help me are better, and get to the shop earlier; so I explain that it's a writer I am, and that makes everything all right. Now if I can just think up some way to make my readers believe that it's a woodworker I am, maybe they'll make allowances, too, and then I'll be sitting pretty all around; like I sit at Parham Parkhurst's general store, meditating, as all writers meditate—even if they're woodworkers. One other important fact about me is: I sing bass in the village choir."

CHRISTINE WESTON (The Dark Wood) writes: "I was born in India and lived there until my marriage in 1924. Since then I have lived in an old brick house in Maine. My career as a writer began in 1940 with Be Thou the Bride, a novel. This was followed by The Devil's Foot, and Indigo. My recent juvenile story, Bhimsa, is my favorite, though I'm told I failed to explain away certain allusions to ghosts. Well, no one has ever explained them away to me! In addition to the usual virtues and vices, I'm a model housewife; but I talk indefatigably and drive my car at high speed. Old age may change that—but so far so good!"

UNDER-COVER STUFF

By Bernardine Kielty

William Allen White

William Allen White, who never was one to talk about himself, finally broke down and wrote the story of his life, and THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE will go down, we believe, as a monument to the way of American living. He was writing it through 1943, and he died before he had it quite finished. But what a good time he must have had remembering: those boyhood days in El Dorado, Kansas; the newspaper days that lasted all his life, in Emporia; the political campaigns of half a century; the days with Teddy Roosevelt—but particularly the boyhood days!

No one (except a typist) saw one word of the manuscript as he was writing it. This was something he couldn't share. Any voice from the outside might break the precious train of memories. Even his beloved Sallie, wife of fifty years, who had been in on every thought and every joy and sorrow, didn't get a glimpse of it. She used to hear him chuckling while he wrote, but that's all.

The book will make you chuckle too. It is ebullient, like Bill White himself, gay and honest and full of sense. Unfortunately, it reaches only to the days of 1923. Then he became ill. The rest of the story has been summarized by his son in an epilogue. But for anyone who wants William Allen White's angle on the period that came next, there is that remarkable book of his about Calvin Coolidge, A PURITAN IN BABYLON, which isn't half well enough known, but will probably remain the outstanding interpretation of the Boom Days.

Everyone thinks of William Allen White as a born newspaper editor. Few know that at one time he seriously considered making music his profession. "Thank fortune I didn't," he used to say. "I'd 'a' been a third-rate music teacher." But we're not so sure. When he came to New York he always went to hear the Philharmonic on Thursday evening or Friday afternoon. At home he had a huge collection of hand-picked records. And in his very last days, he asked Sallie almost every evening to put on the Schubert string quintet in C-major. The Kansas-prairie boy-grown-old died to the loveliest music of the long-ago young Viennese.

Franz Werfel

Franz Werfel has died too. But if ever we could feel that the spirit of man still hovers close after death, it would be the spirit of Werfel, who was a deeply religious soul and a mystic, concerned more than almost any other modern author with the yearnings of mankind toward a life beyond. THE SONG OF BERNADETTE is an example of what we mean, and EMBEZZLED HEAVEN, and now—and how much more so!—his last novel, STAR OF THE UNBORN, finished one week before he died. It is the story of a little man, F. W., who after his death is transported to a place in time 100,000 years hence. But Werfel tackles the problems of the psyche with no unctuousness—always with a kind of bubbling good humor. Even in this last book, probably his greatest achievement and his deepest search, we laughed out loud as we read. For F. W. (whom we knew as a short, almost tubby little man) appears in the eerie realms of the future in the same garb and condition in which he was buried in 1945. Instead of the diaphanous garments that these distant people wore, he found himself barging about in the old black frock coat that the family had pulled out of a trunk to bury him in, with patent-leather shoes too tight, because, being thrifty, they had considered an old pair good enough for the purpose. Moreover, there were no eyeglasses in the coffin—a serious handicap for F. W., who was very near-sighted. But the whole book is a remarkable feat of the imagination, one of the most distinguished novels of the period, not easy reading in spite of the light touches, but well worth the careful concentration that it takes.

Kay Boyle's new novel, to appear soon, is about France. After all, she lived there twenty years, and during the war was sent back by the United States Army on work that required a specialist. It's material she got on that trip—about the Fascist French, authentic and up-to-the-minute—that she has used in A FRENCHMAN MUST DIE, a novel on the order of her popular AVALANCHE of a year or so back.

Kay Boyle

These two books are a departure for Kay Boyle, the intellectual, whose books used to be distinctly of the long-haired variety. Before the war she was one of the small esoteric group of literary experimenters who appeared regularly in Transition, the Paris-American Little Magazine. She wrote poetry and short stories, beautiful but sometimes baffling. It's no doubt her return to easygoing, unexacting, wholesome America that accounts for the change. At any rate, she came back—she and her husband and six children, by clipper plane, the largest family ever to make the transatlantic flight.

Since her arrival she has remarried and had two more children. But unlike the old woman in the shoe, she knows exactly what to do with her enormous family. It is a remarkable ménage. The older take care of the younger. Much of the time there is no maid, but the meals are excellent, on time, the family sits down to them together, and guests are many and always welcome. The children have the good manners of a French bringing up, and the initiative of the hardy Minnesotans (their mother, strange as it may seem, was born in St. Paul). In fact, one of the older daughters (16) who studied French stenography over here, has now gone back to Paris to look for a job.

All through the war Kay Boyle worked for the Government, not only on her mission to France, but broadcasting in French from here. Now, as then, she is constantly offering bed and board to homeless soldiers and sailors. And through it all she writes, finishes what she's writing, and sells it to an increasingly large public—a good person to remember when we think we're being overworked.

MINORITIES

BY STRUTHERS BURT

CHARLEY—we'll call him Woolsey—worked for me for a number of years. When sober, which was most of the time, and when some "minority" wasn't "persecuting" him, he was one of the best ranch hands I've ever seen. Intelligent, skillful, loyal and quiet. And then, suddenly, the storm would begin to build up just like the premonitions of a hurricane.

For a week or so Charley would be very grim, and more silent than usual; after that, increasingly communicative, dropping dark hints about some group or other out to ruin the country and along with it all honest Americans like himself. Sometimes it was the local sheriff. Or a neighbor. Or the ranch owners and cattlemen. Frequently it was the President. And Charley was magnificently nonpartisan in this respect. It made no difference whether the President at the moment happened to be a Republican or a Democrat, Charley was against him. Likely as not it was some religious, or racial, or economic, or social stratum. It just depended upon what Charley had been reading. He was an omnivorous reader, but not a very wise one. Out of the corner of his mouth, ancient and discredited lies dripped like the froth of a mad dog. And these people, the group uppermost in his mind—it might be the Mormons, or the Catholics, or the Methodists; or the rich, or the poor, and so on ad infinitum—these people were engaged in a black conspiracy to keep Charley down; to prevent him from being the man he could be.

Presently you would begin to smell whisky on his breath, even early in the morning. Then, if you were wise, you would give him some of his pay, lock up the rest, and tell him to go down country and take a holiday. In a month or two he would wander back, sober and slightly worn, his nose on the other side of his face.

Charley's nose was famous throughout the countryside. It was a long, thin, inquisitive nose, easily broken. Charley was very disagreeable when suffering from his "moods," especially when leaning up against a bar. Charley would assume that the stranger next to him, no matter who he might be, belonged to the "minority" at the moment engaged in persecuting him. This often resulted in Charley's nose being broken again. Sometimes Charley wore his nose to the left; sometimes to the right.

Of course Charley was a paranoiac; a marked one. One of the signs of paranoia

WANTED: LEADERSHIP

By Dorothy Thompson

AT present our society rightly complains of the lack of leadership. There are reasons for this, and it might be constructive to consider what they are. The war, and the new economic situation created by the war, had already, before the death of President Roosevelt, ended the New Deal by ending, however temporarily, the state of affairs which had created the New Deal mentality and its various programs. Although many of these were contradictory, the essence of the New Deal was the concept of the Welfare State, placing less emphasis on production than on the more equal distribution of a national production, whose potentialities were, in all prewar calculations, grossly underestimated.

During the war the producer, rather than the social worker, came to the fore, while all domestic programs and the President's leadership were relegated to secondary place after foreign affairs.

The pattern of the peace and the United Nations Organization as a Big Three enterprise, in which unity would be maintained by mutual recognition of and respect for spheres of influence, had already been laid down before Mr. Truman became President. So had the pattern of Germany's administration, the shifts of eastern frontiers, and the tendency to concede to Russian interpretations of the meaning of "democratic" government in the Eastern European countries.

Thus President Truman inherited a foreign policy that had already jelled in critical places, while it was left open and ambiguous in others, and a domestic policy which had sacrificed most of its original philosophy and plans to the dynamic developments of the war.

A great war, and above all this war, cannot be an extraneous episode, which, when it is over, permits a return to life as it was before. Neither the world nor America will ever be the same again. The realization of this dawns only gradually and contributes to a general sense of alarm, as when a familiar landscape shows weird changes in the shapes and arrangements of things. Leadership must, therefore, try calmly to take stock of the new factors. It cannot merely hope to follow a previous pattern.

Historic Europe has returned to roughly its area in the days of Charlemagne. Old Prussia, most of the Austro-Hungary of 1914, Serbia, Bulgaria and Rumania have beome satellites of Russia, and in every probability will eventually become republics in the multi-national Soviet Union, as the Baltic states already have.

Germany embraces only three quarters of her smallest previous historic territory, and the probability exists that her demographical decline will be as great, leaving her eventually with far less land and not much greater a population than France.

France is no longer a great power. Britain has lost her centuries-old financial position. In India she is no longer a creditor, but a debtor. All colonial empires are crumbling or precariously held together by force, and the force itself has been weakened, as the colonial empires are based on Europe, and Europe is weakened.

The system of private corporate capitalism remains fairly intact in only one great country: the United States. Defeat, collapse and Allied policies have smashed it in Germany. Elsewhere in Europe, all parties that have any mass support are socialist in greater or less degree. Impoverishment and destruction would, of themselves, further socialism, and the tendency is enhanced and supported by the immensely augmented power of the Soviet Union.

The industrial workers are emerging as a dominant political force, challenging the prewar social systems, both economically and politically, through powerful and ably led organizations, and encouraged in the United States especially by wartime revelations of productive capacity.

A new source of energy has been discovered, of a power hitherto unknown in the world, which, if used in war, threatens to obliterate large sections of mankind.

American leadership must give full and fearless recognition to all these revolutionary facts and forces. To try to deny, overlook or underrate them can only contribute to letting the dynamism of events slip out of control. Nor can American leadership wait upon policies originating in the people. Without guidance, within the framework of a clear aim and

CHOICE CHOCOLATE CAKE

Use only GOLD MEDAL "Kitchen-tested" Enriched Flour with this Betty Crocker recipe

Have all ingredients at room temperature (70°-75°). (Shortening should be soft—not melted.) Pre-heat oven to 350° (mod.). Grease and dust with flour two 8" round layer pans (1¼" deep). Sift Gold Medal Flour before measuring. Measure ingredients accurately (level) before mixing. Just before starting to mix cake, pour ⅓ cup boiling water into 3 sq. (3 oz.) melted unsweetened chocolate. Stir until a paste is formed.

Sift together into bowl
- 1¾ cups sifted GOLD MEDAL "Kitchen-tested" Flour
- *1½ cups sugar
- †1 tsp. salt
- †1 tsp. soda

Add
- ⅓ cup high grade vegetable shortening
- 1 tsp. vanilla
- ¾ cup milk

Beat vigorously with spoon for 2 min. by clock (about 150 strokes per min.). You may rest a moment when beating by hand; just count actual beating time or strokes. Or mix with electric mixer on slow to med. speed for 2 min. Scrape bottom and sides of bowl frequently.

Add
- ⅓ to ½ cup unbeaten eggs (2 medium)

Beat 1 more minute.

Add . . . . . the warm chocolate paste

Beat 1 more minute.

Pour batter into prepared pans.

Bake 30 to 35 minutes.

When cake is cool, frost with White Wonder Icing (recipe below).

TO SAVE ON SUGAR, use ⅔ cup sugar and ⅔ cup corn syrup. Reduce milk to ½ cup plus 1 tbsp. Add syrup with milk to dry ingredients.

WHITE WONDER ICING

Mix in top of double boiler
- ¼ cup unbeaten egg whites (about 2)
- ½ cup sugar
- 2 tsp. white corn syrup
- 1/16 tsp. cream of tartar

Place over boiling water for about 6 min., stirring with finger until you can't keep it in mixture. Remove from heat. Beat vigorously with rotary beater until icing holds shape (10 min.).

Blend in . . . . . ½ tsp. flavoring

Dark Secrets!

1. To melt chocolate, place it (broken into small pieces) in a cup or small bowl, set in a strainer over a little rapidly boiling water.

2. For the deep dark chocolatey color in this cake, be sure that the water you pour over the melted unsweetened chocolate is boiling hot.

3. Let the chocolate-and-water paste cool until it's only warm before you start adding this paste to the batter in the final step of mixing.

Don't melt the chocolate in the oven. It gets a burned taste unless melted at low temperature.

Why Not Now? Eventually

WARNING! Recipe above has been developed and "proportioned" only for Gold Medal. Don't use another flour! Remember, Gold Medal is truly all-purpose—"tops" for pies, rolls, cookies, etc. See folder in sacks for a variety of tested recipes!

Easy Does it!

THE SUB-DEB

EDITED BY

Maureen Daly

HE'S YOUR GUY, BUT—

You're only young once, so naturally any smart gal wants to make the most of it—but why have all your good times the hard way? You can have as much fun as the next gal without rocking the floor boards, shaking the walls and scaring off all the best boys in your crowd by making like a cheerleader every time you get near a little excitement! If you're not a guilty party to this rah-rah raucousness, at least you know the type. The gal with this eager-beaver technique goes over with a bang no matter where she is (and if a few schoolbooks or a drugstore chair gets toppled over too—that's all part of the act!). She doesn't mean to be loud; in fact, she usually doesn't even know she is loud—she's just having fun with sound effects. And this girl gets particularly exuberant when there are a few smooth joes around. If she's on a street corner, she doesn't mind shouting to last-Friday-night's date who happens to be turning the corner down on Wilkins Street a block away; if she's in the drugstore with the crowd after school, she doesn't mind carrying on a conversation from booth to booth via the loud-speaker system (her own, of course); and even in the halls at school, you can hear her coming because her voice sounds out over the slamming of locker doors, shuffling of feet and the buzz-buzz conversation of a few dozen other fellows and gals. And sometimes, especially with boys again, she will give her conversation emphasis by adding a slap on the back or a good, hard shove to finish off her sentence. She still likes to chase boys round the block, indulge in a hair-mussing contest, pull off a hat or two, and tries to show her friendship by "horsing around." She just thinks she's having fun—but her friends aren't, because neither gals nor fellows like to be embarrassed by a loud character who stands out in a crowd. If you want boys to like you, don't you act like one!

INSIDE, OUTSIDE

Two's a couple, three's a crowd and any larger number is a problem—especially if that number is made up of high-school girls, jamming into a streetcar, window-shopping en masse or walking down the sidewalk five abreast! When you are in a store, on the street or in any public place—either step it up or break it up! No playing leapfrog round the counters, sampling the wares of the perfume counter and taking up the salesgirls' time by trying on sequin dinner dresses and mink-trimmed evening scarfs that you know you don't mean to buy anyway! And the same kind of social life on the hoof can make a bottleneck in rush-hour traffic. Get a group of high-school girls on a streetcar or bus with armfuls of books and a lot of happy chatter, and there isn't much room for shoppers with bundles or even one tired businessman to find a place to sit or even to worm his way out when the car comes to his stop. And did you ever see a meek and mild average customer fight his way into a drugstore for a box of aspirin when the crowd takes over after a basketball game? If he didn't need the aspirin before he went in, he'll need it before he makes his way out again! Have as much fun as you can whenever you can, but don't forget to leave room for somebody else!

ALL AROUND THE TOWN

Sometimes you can catch the best show in town down at the local movie theater—and it isn't on the screen either! You might have the bad luck to sit right behind a couple of high-school characters who use the theater for everything from a quick snack counter to catching up on yesterday's conversation! And right in the middle of the March of Time film too! It doesn't matter if the screen is showing Boyer and Bacall or a good sports spectacle from Madison Square Garden, these two will make with the low whispers, crinkle the wrapping from a candy bar under the seat, drop a few salted peanuts on the floor and then start in on the second box of popcorn. Of course, they're having fun themselves, but they just happened to forget about the other paying customers who had dinner before they came to see the show! And next in line to the pair who like to sit through the double feature with a package lunch are the amorous characters who catch the mood of the movie and indulge in a little extracurricular hand-holding of their own. Usually Stupor Man and his smitten kitten sit with heads together (blocking the screen, of course), his arm around the back of her chair, making a very pretty picture, but not nearly so interesting as the movie going on up front—if only the audience could see! Love is a wonderful thing—but a private thing—so how about watching the show?

DO YOU HAVE YOURS?

What's blue and mulberry, wallet-sized, all your own and absolutely free? Your official Sub-Deb identification card, of course! And if you're a member of a Sub-Deb Club, registered at National Headquarters, bring the matter up at your next club meeting. Just send a list of all club members, with return addresses, to National Sub-Deb Headquarters at LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania, and you'll have your Sub-Deb identification cards for all your members by return mail!

BOTH FEET ON THE GROUND

Remember the old song that goes, "Did you ever see a dream walking?" Did you ever try to imagine how you yourself look when you are walking—just walking down the street, through the halls at school or across the floor at a dance? Do you look like that "dream walking"—or are you slightly on the nightmare side? Poise is a definite part of developing into an attractive finished product, so get both feet on the ground now, figuratively and literally, and keep them there! Often a combination of fuzzy socks and moccasins, bulky jackets and rolled-up jeans can make a girl walk and act just as rough-and-tumble as she feels. That rugged look is all right as long as you don't let the "overall attitude" go to your head! No standing like a female Tarzan with legs apart, hands jammed in pockets and shoulders slouched over. No stomping through the halls, pounding up the stairs, slamming doors or crashing down into your seat in study hall. No draping over chairs in the living room, tripping over rugs just because you happen to be wearing your heavy socks, tossing your lumber jacket onto the nearest doorknob because it's too bulky to hang up in the closet! A smooth gal can wear anything, go anywhere and do anything and still look and act like a girl. So remember, whether at home, in school or just out taking a walk around the block with your current joe friend—easy does it!

Sniffles? Sneezing?

Sore Throat?

Gargle Listerine — Quick!

OFTEN this delightful precaution, taken early and repeatedly, helps to head off a cold entirely or lessen its severity. Here is why:

Listerine Antiseptic reaches way back on throat surfaces to kill millions of the "secondary invaders". These troublesome germs, many authorities agree, cause practically all of the misery and serious complications of a cold.

When Germs Strike

When your feet are wet or cold . . . when you are tired or chilled . . . get into a draft . . . or go from a hot room into the cold outdoors . . . body resistance is often so lowered that the "secondary invaders" find it easy to stage a mass invasion of the tissue. Since they can aggravate an infection it should be handled like an infection—with germ-killing action.

So, remember, at the first hint of a cold, use Listerine Antiseptic. Better still, make the Listerine-gargle a morning and night habit.

Fewer Colds in Tests

Bear in mind Listerine's impressive record made in tests over a 12-year period; those who gargled Listerine Antiseptic twice daily had fewer colds than non-garglers . . . also fewer sore throats.

Germs Reduced up to 96.7% in Tests

Fifteen minutes after a Listerine Antiseptic gargle, tests showed bacterial reductions on mouth and throat surfaces ranging up to 96.7%, and up to 80% one hour after a Listerine Antiseptic gargle.

THE "SECONDARY INVADERS"

These are some types of the threatening germs that cause so much of the misery of a cold when they invade the body through throat membranes.

Dorothy is Repatriated

The Duke's Cottage, Rudgwick, England.

My Dears: The storms that rage about our little island are supplying us with shatter explosions comparable with anything we have had since Dunkirk. Mines washed ashore are blowing up right and left, shattering the old ladies of Worthing, marooning the residents of Hythe and Sandgate, and making our windows, twenty-eight miles inland, rattle and jar. One of the explosions was so loud and sounded so near that it awoke me last night, and for a moment I thought it was another doodlebug.

Eric the pony boy grew a foot in my absence, and the long pants I bought him in September have all turned to shorts. And his voice has broken. I keep thinking I hear a burglar down below, but it is only the dear little man with his new voice.

And talking of burglars, you can hardly hear yourself speak in England today, for the cracking of cribs! The gangsters have broken loose amongst us with a vengeance. Ladies with nice fur coats now sleep in them, and even that makes no difference. They take the lady too. So far we have been wonderfully preserved, in this village, from marauders, and even my chickens have survived. (They are the kind that are too scraggy for the pot, which may protect them a bit.) But I am touching wood, turning my money, and bowing to the new moon. Just to be on the safe side.

I wish you could have seen the faces of the children in our village school here, when I went down with those two American dolls, pink and blue, sitting up in a clothes basket. Lots of the children just have never seen toys like that.

My love to you all, and please tell Julia that I hope to return to America soon so I can once more taste her lemon meringue pie.

Your repatriated,
DOROTHY BLACK.

My dear Bruce and Beatrice: Boys one knew long ago in another world are beginning to come back to the village. The amazing thing, to me, was to see the little boy who went to America aged ten, now towering over his mother, with that jolly unself-conscious manner the kids have.

Mary's rampageous baby is busy now, discovering things. And as it never walks anywhere but always goes at a brisk trot, Mary's life is pretty full. It is useless to fix a gate. Annette learned how to unfasten things like that, with her first tooth. She goes meantime proudly about the garden, taking enormous steps, in a sort of goose step, wearing her American boots. She simply loves them.

One of Mary's cronies in the WAAF, a pretty girl called Ray, has just married an American colonel and is off to Boston. Rather apprehensive. She doesn't feel sure she will be welcome, having got one of the best-looking Americans I have ever seen (always excepting you, Bruce, of course!). I have been cheering her up, and telling her to have no fear, that all she will find awaiting her is quite astounding kindness. Love to you both.

DOROTHY.

Salute to Mrs. Roosevelt

Moscow, Idaho.

Dear Editors: When I wrote recommending that Mrs. Roosevelt's department be discontinued, I did not imagine that I would get so much fun out of letters received in consequence.

I had three letters of warm commendation. But the surprising and amusing part to me was the terrible vehemence, the unquestioning loyalty and the shattering criticism which the supporters of her department displayed.

Very truly yours,
DORTHEA DAHL.

Although Mrs. Roosevelt is no longer in the White House, interest in her thoughts and activities has not diminished perceptibly, judging by the avidity with which her JOURNAL page is read by JOURNAL readers. It continues to be the best-read page of "pure reading matter" published in any magazine. ED.

Gentlemen: Enclosed is a picture of my daughter, Laurie, at five months in our barrel cradle, inspired by the one in Journal About Town, and made by my brother-in-law.

Laurie's father, Lt. Col. Robert S. Riddell, is on the way home from Japan. He has never seen either Laurie or the cradle, but says "By the pictures, I imagine it is cute." The fact that Laurie is, too, he takes for granted.

Laurie—she's cute too.

Thank you for the idea.

Will You Pay to Live Longer?

Johnson City, Tennessee.

Dear Sir: William L. Laurence's article in the December JOURNAL, Tomorrow You May Be Younger, was very interesting and factually pretty accurate. However, your introduction is not quite correct. Mr. Laurence is not the first to report the work of Bogomolets to the general public. Hirshberg, in the American Weekly, July 30, 1944, had a two-page spread; Dr. Martin Gumpfert gave an account of it in his book, You Are Younger Than You Think; and shorter mention has been made by De Kruif in The Male Hormone; Scope Magazine, and various others.

In America Doctors Pomerat and Anigstein at the University of Texas Medical School have carried out most of the work published in this country. They have verified the statements of the Russian scientists in regard to the cytotoxic action (cellular inhibition of large doses), and cellular stimulation in small doses of anit-reticular-cytotoxic serum (ACS or ARCS in Russia, but called Reticuloendothelial Immune Serum, or R.E.I.S., in America by Pomerat and Anigstein). Pomerat and Anigstein have even gone further: they have localized the action of this serum in the globulin fraction of the blood. Several months ago Science stated that a foundation had been established in the Middle West for the study of this serum in cancer therapy. In spite of the amazing benefits of this serum in Russia, and the verification of its action in this country, there has been an extraordinary amount of apathy toward it in this country. I cannot fully agree with Mr. Laurence that the slowness of its application in the United States is a result, primarily, of the war. I have been doing some work on aging for the past two years and have encountered a great deal of apathy toward aging therapy. I have met bitter antagonism toward aging therapy from the standpoints of religion, morals, politics, and even economics.

During the past five years an educational program has been in effect in this country to obtain support, both moral and financial. Fortunately, the campaign is beginning to bear fruit, and in a few years we ought to be up with Russia in our attitude toward the prolongation of life. The majority of this work has been performed by the United States and Russia, with the rest of the world running very far behind. The solution of the problem will require money, trained men and a few years of effort. The problem actually reduces to the question of whether people would rather spend money now to double their life span via medicine, or to spend it on other pursuits and die with their allotted spans half completed.

Thanks very much for Mr. Laurence's excellent article, and I hope that it can bring to the forefront this very important problem. Very truly yours,

THOMAS S. GARDNER, PH.D.

Dear Mr. Gould: I agree with Doctor Gardner's views as to our slowness and apathy in study of the aging problem, though this attitude, as pointed out in my article, is now slowly changing. However, considering the importance of the problem, we are not approaching it with anywhere near the zeal and energy it calls for. As Doctor Gardner points out, we need a lot of money and trained men, and the sums available at present are trifling. Apart from consideration of human values in terms of happiness and well-being, it would be worth billions to the nation from a purely economic standpoint to invest a few millions now. It should, therefore, become a national effort. I should like to see every man and woman thirty-five or over contribute one dollar a year toward solution of this problem, and we would have it licked in a few years. There are golden years in them thar hills. One dollar a year now may add ten to thirty useful years to everyone's life span.

It may not be a bad idea for the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL to start this "Dollar-a-Year for Ten Years of Life" campaign among its millions of women readers.

As for Doctor Gardner's statement about prior popular articles, I have never read or heard of any of those he mentions. I still believe, however, that the article in the JOURNAL is the first complete account for the lay public.

WILLIAM L. LAURENCE.

Why Feed the Germans?

Beecher City, Illinois

Dear Editors: I do not agree with Mr. Wallace's reply to Can We Eat Well and Feed Europe Too? I think we can supply Europe with some food, but I also think we could see that some of the people in our slums are fed better!

I can't help thinking: "Would the Germans have fed us—had we lost?"

Sincerely,
Name withheld by request.

The answer is "No." Had the Nazis been the kind of people we are, we would not have had to fight them. Since we cannot exterminate them—as they tried to exterminate the Jews, their political opponents, and "inferior races like the Poles and Russians"—we must, if we have the wit and patience, educate them to be civilized members of a civilized world community.

We agree that we had better feed our own ill-fed people, too, but the two aims are not mutually exclusive. ED.

Food Waste in Restaurants

Riverside, California.

Dear Beatrice and Bruce: Is there any practical way of persuading American hotels and restaurants to cut their helpings in half, to charge just what they do now for excessive portions and to turn over for European relief the money thus saved—or the food!

I am struck constantly by the enormous overloading of everyone's plates, the food that is just stirred round and left. It makes me sick when I think of starving children and old people, and everyone of every age. Love,

KATHARINE NEWLIN BURT.

Do It Yourself

Chicago, Illinois.

Dear Mrs. Gould: Perhaps you may be interested in my solution to What You Can Do to Help. In August I decided that I was sick and tired of reading about the homeless and needy in Europe and decided to do something about it. My sympathies lay most strongly with the Poles and the Greeks—for the obvious reason that despite their nonbelligerence, they seemed to have suffered the most. So, the problem was to discover the name and whereabouts of a Polish or Greek person in need.

Look, it's so simple it's like falling off a log. If only I had sufficient means, there are at least twenty-odd people I could be sending boxes to each month. There is a very large and beautiful Polish Roman Catholic church not too far from us, and I got the name of my displaced person through one of the priests there. He was a refugee himself, and was overjoyed to give me the name and address of his friend and colleague, Father Francis Forecki.

As I understand it, Father Forecki was in Dachau for six years. A long time. He was tortured; he fell ill; he has had beriberi and now has arthritis and rheumatism, besides skin disorders, as a result of exposure. I learned this from an American priest at St. Michael's; Father Forecki never complains, nor does he ever ask for anything. He is now in Bretenoux, France, together with several other Poles. In their small colony are children from tiny babies to fourteen-year-old youngsters.

To pack a box for these people is, strangely enough, heartbreaking. There's so darned much they need and I can't send them everything, for there are limits to my purse. However, a box usually includes quickly cooked food—they have little or no fuel—coffee, tea, chocolate, sugar (yes, and now all I've left is five boxes of powdered sugar!) and tobacco—these always—soap always, petroleum jelly and ointments, toothbrushes and tooth paste, talc. Once I sent a lipstick in case someone's "morale" needed one badly. I've sent woolen underwear to Father and cotton socks to go inside the woolen ones I sent. My inspirations to date have been darning cotton and thread and a canned-heat stove. Why I didn't think of the latter before I don't know, for tea and coffee can be made on those like a dream.

Now where can someone else find a pet refugee? It's much easier than finding any other kind of pet, really. We have countless refugees in this country. The woman who sells me brushes is a refugee from Austria, and her family is still somewhere in Europe.

Maybe I could write to my congressman, and I'm delighted to contribute to any fund that helps—here or abroad—but truly, I think Ben Franklin had a beautiful idea: "If you would have a thing done and done well, you must do it yourself."

Most sincerely,
MARGARET P. ADDISON.

Dear Editors: The article, "Are American 'Moms' a Menace?" is downright disgusting. It's time we mothers told those psychiatrists and psychologists to mind their own business!

Most "American Moms," having to be chief cook and bottlewasher, wife and mother, community leader and glamour girl, are too busy to be a "menace." Personally, we never underestimate the power of a woman—if she's an American girl. ED.

I am not a religious person. But I try to guide my living and thinking by the teachings of Christ. Reasoning leads me to conclude that His teachings are the sum total of all that man knows of ethics and morality. When religious people refuse to acknowledge Christ by including tolerance in their blueprint for living, I write them off as nonbelievers.

Fifty Years Ago in the Journal

THE song hit of March, 1896, was Sweet Rosie O'Grady, Mark Hanna was running the Republican presidential campaign, and $50 bought a first-class passage to Europe. Emperor William found out what was wrong with his arm through the sensational new discovery, X ray, and Ohio lawmakers prohibited women from wearing big hats at the theater.

"Like all men of worth, he loved women," remarks G. W. Greely about George Washington in the March, 1896, JOURNAL. "His language was always clean, and never in any way vulgar. One or two slips mar his youthful letters, but they must be attributed to . . . extreme feeling."

Since then the shows have been seen in Detroit, Boston and Chicago; this month they'll be in Pittsburgh and Cincinnati; April in Minneapolis and St. Louis; May and June in San Francisco and Los Angeles; July in Milwaukee and Seattle, and they'll be in Cleveland in September. The most popular free spectacle in town, for visitors and New Yorkers alike, is the Fifth Avenue which climaxes over from the Workshop; and the reason, apart from the people you see, is what goes on in the windows. The shops are pretty strict among themselves about motion effects and sound effects to attract attention. No sound effects at all, and anything that moves in a window display must be mighty subtle. A window man like Gene Moore, who at a near-by store designs some of the most exciting sets along the Avenue, and whom our camera caught one night while he was up to his ears in manikins, changes his twenty windows once a week and plans them two months in advance. # THE DARK WOOD

BY CHRISTINE WESTON

IN April the city stood upright and splendid; airplanes circled above it, painting vaporous epigraphs across the sky, and to the gay boys who rode in them the city looked like a handful of needles thrusting between strands of water, where crawled the liners, the tugs, the corpulent ferries emitting mournful toots. Oh, boy! thought the skywriters, coming to the end of a vowel a mile long. Look at her down there, all sweet and unscathed. What a target! And some, remembering the cinder heaps of London and Rotterdam, of Cassino and Berlin and the wastes of Hiroshima, speculated on how many missions it would take to translate the wondrous city to a pile of blackened straw. Like children, or like men in a daydream, the fliers took the lovely thing apart and smiled, seeing it stretched far beneath them, apparently eternal under the peaceful April sky.

On a humbler level other eyes appraised the twilight which traveled from cube to cube and from pyramid to pyramid. For a moment in this season space and mass had achieved a tenuous balance. Then evening stepped forward, the fliers flew home to roost, women clustering like bees round shopwindows swarmed reluctantly on their way. The white shaft of the R.C.A. Building stretched and leaned backward toward the sun, the cathedral darkened, and Atlas, gritting his teeth, raised his head a trifle and lifted, a fraction, his load.

A taxi deposited three people before the entrance to a night club in the East Forties, and as he shepherded his women companions toward the door Dick Sparrow said, "I hope you girls like this joint. It was recommended to me by Bill Symes."

"Are you trying to establish your usual alibi?" demanded his wife.

"Habit," he replied gaily. "My lawyer's training, you know."

They passed through the doors into a gale of music.

"I reserved a table," said Dick. "Where's that captain of waiters? He's a pal of Symes." He turned to a dignified personage: "I am

Mr. Sparrow, and I have a table reserved for four people." The stranger glared blankly, and Dick apologized.

They moved on and Miriam Sparrow laughed. "That was a mistake your friend Symes would never make! The old boy looked like a retired four-star general, at least."

Dick countered: "Remember the time in the Biltmore, during the war, when you asked an admiral the way to the ladies' room? And he was in uniform too."

"He looked like the doorman to me," replied Miriam loftily.

"Must have been that faraway look in his eyes," muttered Dick. He lifted a timid eyebrow at a real waiter, and they were guided deftly to their table. "There were to have been four of us," Dick explained to the man as he bustled round them with glasses and napkins. "The other gentleman let us down. What shall it be, girls?"

The waiter took their order and departed, and Dick looked at Stella Harmon.

"I'm sorry Symes couldn't come tonight. I wanted you to meet him before you take the plane tomorrow. He'll be traveling on it as far as Lisbon."

"I've been composing a speech of thanks," said Stella. "It was really good of him to fix up about that seat. The air-line people had told me I'd have to wait a month."

"Symes is always doing little things like that for his friends," said Dick.

"In grateful recognition of all the little things they do for him," Miriam remarked maliciously.

Dick smiled. "Miriam doesn't care for Mr. Symes. She's the only woman I know who doesn't, and she takes pride in her exclusiveness."

"Where does he get his influence?" asked Stella. "I mean, this ability to find unknown women seats on the transatlantic clipper, and all that?"

"Symes is in with the air lines. He's in, actually, with all the worth-while people. Isn't he, Dick?"

"That's one way of saying he's a highly intelligent and, in his quiet fashion, important guy. Imagine a man hardly forty, confidential adviser to the State Department!"

Stella inquired what Mr. Symes did for the State Department, and Miriam answered, "No one knows, exactly. As Dick says, it's something very confidential. Symes speaks several languages, and is an expert on what are called natural resources. You know—uranium, and that sort of thing. His work takes him all over the world. He once showed me a snapshot of himself dressed in a burnoose, gazing contemptuously at the Sphinx."

"But why should such an important person bother his head about me?"

MIRIAM laughed. "Dick asked him to. He's one of Dick's clients—in an informal, unobtrusive sort of way. You see, a man in Symes' position can't afford to take ordinary chances, so whenever he meditates doing anything of a personal and more or less dubious nature, he looks to Dick for the green light."

Dick shook his head. "Honest, Miriam ——"

"But," said Stella, "how does it happen he never figures in the newspapers? I hadn't so much as heard his name until you spoke of him the other day."

"He's the soul of modesty," Miriam explained. "In fact, I think you might say he has a pathological horror of publicity."

Dick regarded her soberly. "You really do dislike that guy, don't you? I can't understand why."

"Maybe it's instinct on my part."

"Is he married?" Stella wanted to know.

"No," said Miriam, with a visible increase of malice. "And if he contemplates marriage only Dick knows about it, and he won't tell. But I did run into Symes once with that handsome Megan—Regan Something; the woman who is always writing and making speeches on social uplift. Out with it, Dick! Does Symes want to marry Mrs. Uplift?"

"All I know is, she happens to be married already. I've never met her, but I seem to recall some newspaper account of her husband—he'd been decorated, or something, in Germany."

The waiter brought their drinks. The dance ended and the dancers drifted back to their tables.

"This is nice," said Stella. She lifted her glass to her companions. "You were sweet to think of it."

Miriam sipped her drink, then gave Stella an earnest look. "You really are going to Italy, aren't you? I wish you'd change your mind. Dick and I both wish it, don't we, Dick?"

He said, "Or if you feel you must go, won't you wait till Miriam and I can go with you?"

"What? After you and Mr. Symes have gone to all the trouble to get me a seat on the clipper?"

"That's easily canceled."

Stella seemed to ponder the situation. A slight frown gave her features their only animation. She looks, Dick thought, like some lovely Pietà, the gilt of youth, the color of the past, barely visible in her deracinated flesh. At thirty she had dedicated herself to grief. She never would get over Alec's death. Pity made him silent, but it did not silence Miriam.

"Yes, Stella. Traveling is getting easier all the time. Maybe we could all get accommodations later on." She glanced at her husband. "When could you get away, Dick?"

"In about three months." His eyes, shrewd behind their glasses, moved from one face to the other as he remembered an earlier conversation with his wife.

"I'M not particularly clever," Miriam had told him then. "I merely use my intuition. And I think it would be a mistake for Stella to go to Italy alone."

"What could happen to her? And if something did happen, how could it be worse than what has happened already?"

Miriam had brooded for a moment before coming out with one of her oblique observations: "It's dangerous for sleepwalkers to be wakened too abruptly."

"But Alec's been dead almost three years! Surely for her to visit his grave couldn't be worse than knowing, as she does, that he's dead."

Miriam had answered obstinately, "She shouldn't be allowed to go alone."

Now Dick felt his wife's compelling glance, and added his persuasions to hers: "Look, Stella. My vacation is due in July. That would give us ample time to arrange for passports and reservations."

Miriam continued urgently, "What about it, Stella? You know we wouldn't intrude. All it would mean is, Dick and I would be around in case—in case"—she hesitated, then finished on a firmer note—"in case you should need us."

But as she spoke she thought, It's no use, no use at all. We've argued this before, and it's just no use. She's made up her mind, without knowing what the decision might do to her once she is face to face with the cold fact of his death. "I'm going to Italy," she told me. "I'm going to Italy to find him. Then I'll know. Then I shan't need the word of strangers. I'll know!" . . . "Stella, you do know!" But Stella had made no reply. She wants to wallow in her grief, Miriam thought bitterly. For Stella grief, like love, had become an obsession; and then an older, darker suspicion had recurred to Miriam. Is it grief, she asked herself, or is it doubt?

Stella said at last, "You're both sweet to worry about me, but you know I must go."

"I hate it," said Miriam. "I hate the thought of it, for you."

"Don't, my dear. After all"—she shrugged—"after all, what could possibly happen? Let's not argue about it any more, please."

"No," Dick agreed quickly, "let's not. Stella knows what she's doing."

The orchestra returned, drums and saxophones throbbed and pealed, and Miriam turned to Dick. "Dance, you two!"

He rose and drew Stella to her feet. They drifted away on the music, and Miriam watched them with the curious pleasure she always derived from seeing her husband dance with other women. She realized that Dick had become aware of Stella, as he had not seemed aware of her when Alec was alive. This realization made Miriam's feelings toward her husband and her friend more than usually poignant and vivid. And that's better, she told herself somberly—yes, that's a lot better than to feel nothing, or to feel the wrong things.

Now as she pursued Dick's tall back, barred by the pale column of Stella's arm, Miriam reflected on her friend's tragedy. She pictured her preparing for this evening's gaiety, drawing the svelte black dress over her head, arranging the white lace scarf, pausing to tighten the pearl in her ear—gestures beloved by men. And she went on to think of Stella alone in her silent room, glancing about her in its loneliness before she snapped (Continued on Page 54)

The STAR THAT FELL IN OHIO

By Sallie Belle Cox

NONE of this would ever have happened if people in Hollywood knew their place, and stayed in it instead of wandering around trying to act like human beings. Or, as mother says, if I could ever mind my own business. She can't understand, she says, why I can't just act my age and let the rest of the world take care of itself. It's my fierce activity, she says, that frightens her, and she keeps asking daddy whatever sort of prenatal influence caused me. Daddy, who is a doctor, just says, "Rubbish. You let her go to too many movies, that's all, and she keeps trying to make plots out of everything. She has a happy-ending complex. And aside from the fact that you dropped her on her head just once too often as a child, she's all right."

Parents are prejudiced, you know, and I'm quite certain that I'm normal, but I guess the real trouble is that I like a few people too much. Among these is my brother John, who is just about my favorite person in this world—aside from mother and daddy, of course, who are pretty nice, though they are very difficult to handle now and then, probably because they're really awfully naïve and never get divorces or anything, so they don't know much about Life and Love and Passion. But I do, because I see a lot of things that they don't. I just run into them.

Take, for instance, the way I ran into Barbara Jennings and that good-looking Lieutenant Gink out on the lighthouse ledge that night last summer. Of course his name isn't Gink; I just call him that because I don't like him even if mother does say that I like anything that wears trousers and is good-looking. On him the trousers don't look good to me, nor the good looks either. His name is really Watkins, but so far as I'm concerned it's mud anyway, because he is definitely a rose which wouldn't smell any sweeter by any other name including his own. I didn't like him because he was so supercilious all during the war whenever he passed any of us sixteen-year-olds on the street, looking so snooty, as though he thought he might look like Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., in that Navy uniform, and giving us the lifted-eyebrow once-over to see if we thought so. He was sort of part wolf, part camel—you know, one gleam with two sneers. And I didn't think he needed to look so big and brave about just sitting in Washington and coming home for week ends so he could hang around Barbara Jennings, who happened to be Johnny's girl. And I only did what any sister would do for a brother who was off fighting the war. I was only trying to keep the home fires burning, and how should I know that it would turn out to be a bonfire when my brother came home?

Well, anyway, on that hot Saturday night in August there was a full moon and I decided to walk out to the lighthouse because that's my favorite place. As I oozed out along the pier past all the anchored yachts, I heard the clink of glasses and people laughing and talking, and I began to feel very sad about Johnny away out in China being shot at. When I got to the lighthouse I was standing there moodily watching the beacon flash over the water when I saw a shooting star and I wished quick like that Johnny would come home soon. Then I cried a little bit, and finally I clambered down off the ledge and sat down on a big rock, so that's why they didn't see me when they came out onto the ledge.

I didn't see them either, but all of a sudden I heard a familiar voice. It was Barbara and she was laughing and drawling in that teasing way that a girl always uses when she's leading a man on. I sat up very stiffly. A masculine voice said something, there was another laugh, and then there was silence. I knew from the movies what that meant. I froze to the rock, and my heart went all limp and dank like seaweed.

Then suddenly I was mad. I was mad clean through. I knew that I should just sit there until they went away, but as mother says, I'm no diplomat. I just wanted to remind Barbara of Johnny, since she was finding it so easy at the moment to forget him. So up I rose from the rocks like the Loch Ness monster, and I only wished that I had a crown and a beard and trident like King Neptune so that I could appear majestic and terrifying I guess I didn't do too badly as it was, however, for they sprang apart as though a bell had rung at the end of a round, and honestly, I thought Ransom was going to fall into the lake.

"Good Godfrey! Right out of the cracks in the rock!" he exclaimed.

Barbara just stood there staring in horror at me as though I were Johnny's ghost. She was all in white with a flower in her hair, and with the moonlight spilling over her and the silvery lake behind her she looked so beautiful that I wanted to hit her.

"Pardon the protrusion," I said casually. "Believe it or not, I was waiting for a submarine."

Ransom drew himself up in his whites and tried to look like an admiral, but to me he looked more like something that had fallen out of a laundry bag.

"Oh, don't mind us!" he said bitterly. "Stick around."

"Thanks just the same," I replied airily. "Next time you're down by the lake, drop in, won't you?" and I ambled nonchalantly off. "Carry on!" I cheerily called back over my shoulder.

I didn't feel very cheery, though, as I dragged my lagging footsteps homeward. Ransom Watkins was stealing Johnny's girl away from him, and Johnny couldn't do anything about it, so I should. But what?

I was still pondering when I got into bed, and I couldn't go to sleep so I sat up with my arms folded and thought hard. This required feminine psychology, and I concentrated on what I knew about women. Something told me that Barbara was going to come soft-soaping around me so that I wouldn't write and tell Johnny about her and Ransom. Something told me that she enjoyed the thought of Johnny thinking only of her, while she kept a candle in the window for him which was definitely burning at both ends. What was sauce for the goose ——

Jealousy. That was what women like Barbara needed to hold their interest! But where was I going to dig up another woman? I thought and thought. This had to be good. If only, I thought, I'd known about this before I'd wished on that shooting star! Star. Star. I suddenly remembered Gloria Allen in the picture I'd seen the week before. She was a swimming star, and it was her first picture, and there had been a scene where she was in a moonlit pool and she wore a bathing suit of sequins. She looked like a mermaid made of diamonds, and it was beautiful. Since Johnny liked to swim, my mind began to sit up and take notice. But how did they get together? And when? My mind kept going around and around getting nowhere as though it were in a revolving door. It finally got off at New York, and hit upon Johnny's last leave. He wrote and told us about a party (Continued on Page 224)

KITTY SAID, "I DON'T WANT TO GO TO MY FIRST COTILLION. I DON'T WANT TO BE TH

BEFORE SHE HAD COME INTO A ROOM, AND SEEN A MAN AND THOUGHT, "HE'S FOR ME."

KITTY had a fire in her bedroom because the old houses of Decatur can be cold in December. Even with her eyes closed she could feel its warmth flicker on her lids. She stretched under her old down quilt, and sighed slowly, and opened her eyes a quarter of the way. When she did that it was still like dreaming. The familiar room waved and swam before her as it had so many times before. When the little pastel of her Great-aunt Evie seemed ready to walk off the wall, Kitty automatically reached out for the squat post of her bed. The cold air on her arm really waked her and she began to laugh. I've been having that nap, she thought, and she went on laughing softly because it was the first nap she'd had since she'd first gone away to school six years before. This is sweet. It's sweet and old and touching, but it's not for me.

Suddenly her heart began to beat fast. "Kitty Lattimer," she whispered, "the world's for you." She lay very still until Estella knocked on the door.

"Miss Kitty," Estella said, "your mother and Miss Evie say for you to git up or you be late sure."

"Run my bath, will you, please, Estella," said Kitty.

She swung her feet over the side of the bed, but for a moment she sat there shivering in the cold. She thought, So tonight I'll be very good. I'll go to this silly cotillion with this unknown young man who has only asked me to please his dull brother who is in love with my sister, and I'll make my silly debut—more than a little late, heaven knows—and all the aunts and all the cousins and all the uncles will be pleased. And then ——

She threw her arms wide and slid off the high old bed. "And then," said Kitty, "I'll spread my wings."

When she was ready, she went to show herself. Her mother was in Evelyn's room, pinning a sheath of lavender orchids on Evelyn's shoulder.

"Look at the elderly debutante," Kitty said.

She was well worth looking at and, indeed, at that moment she may well have been the prettiest dark-eyed blonde in the world. She wore a white tulle and taffeta dress that was short in the front and long in the back, and a cut-crystal necklace, and extremely stubby silver pumps. It was 1928, and by those standards she could not have been more charmingly dressed.

"My child, you are a dream," said Mrs. Lattimer, who was an adaptable lady of the old school.

"You look nice," said Evelyn. "Come get your flowers."

Kitty opened the second white pasteboard box. "Oh, my," she said and her eyes shone. The two orchids she took up with such careful fingers were white except for their pale yellow hearts. "Aren't they big?" Then irreverently she giggled. "Doesn't a Bates send anything but orchids to his young lady?"
